The Literary Week.

ONE result of the shameful verdict of the Rennes court-martial has been to postpone the publication of Dreyfus literature. Had an acquittal been pronounced we might already, or within a very few days, have been in possession of several histories of the affaire. But, as it is, these books will be held over until some kind of finish has been reached. For really lucid and orderly accounts of the whole matter there will be a great sale. Meanwhile the Graphic has issued an excellent illustrated supplement carrying the affaire to date.

WHILE awaiting either for removal to his permanent prison or for the nullification of his monstrous sentence, Captain Dreyfus has resorted to novel-reading. The regulations permit him all novels he may want, except those published within the past four years—a confession of the possible power of the despised “intellectual,” or literary party.

It has been gravely stated by a contemporary that the decision of the Rennes court-martial will not affect seriously the sale of French novels in this country. No one would expect it to. English feeling may carry us very far—too far, probably—but it would never interfere with our enjoyment of the writings of, say, M. Anatole France. We should as soon think of condemning our unhappy neighbours by giving up French mustard or plaster of Paris.

LAST week we hinted at another publishing venture in connexion with one of the more conservative daily papers. We may now state that the paper is the Standard, and the work to be circulated under its auspices is an anthology of English prose and verse in several volumes, edited by Dr. Garnett. The Guardian, another paper which adopts new mercantile ideas but slowly, is about to offer its readers special facilities for acquiring Tissot's Life of Christ.

WE are glad to be able to state that Mr. Grant Allen's condition of health may now be considered less serious. For a long time the doctors were unable to discover from what cause their patient suffered such intense pain; but the seat of the disease has now been located, and it is probable that improvement may henceforward be steady.

THE editorship of the Atlantic Monthly has just changed hands, passing from Mr. Walter H. Page to Prof. Bliss Perry. Mr. Page, who has edited the magazine since 1896, has gone over to the new firm of Harper Brothers, Doubleday, McClure & Co., where he will have charge of the great encyclopædia that they are projecting. Prof. Bliss Perry, his successor, has been Holmes Professor of English Literature at Princeton since 1893. The Atlantic Monthly is now as interesting as ever it was.

THERE is every sign that Harpers' Magazine, good though it is and has always been, will benefit by the amalgation of its proprietors' firm with that of Messrs. Doubleday, McClure & Co. A general toning up of the concerns of the two houses seems to be in progress, and the readers of Harpers' will not suffer. Among the editor's arrangements are monthly articles by Mr. Kipling, to be entitled “A Winter Note Book,” and serials by Mrs. Humphry Ward and Mr. I. Zangwill. In America the price of the magazine has been reduced to twenty-five cents.

THE publishing business of Mr. James Bowden has, we are informed, been acquired by Messrs. Harper Brothers, Doubleday, McClure & Co.

ELSEWHERE in this number will be found an article, reprinted from an American magazine, on Ibsen. The portrait, which we print below, from the same periodical, represents Ibsen at the age of forty, and is very little known.

IBSEN AT THE AGE OF FORTY.

THIS week the autumn publishing season has begun. The stream is but a thin one at present, yet it will be a tremendous river shortly. The end of October will see its high tide. Readers of the Times, by the way, might imagine that the busy season was with us now, from the long articles on “Books of the Week” which have been appearing of late every other day.

LORD ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL's eight-lined inscription for the William Black memorial beacon runs thus :

We fain would let thy memory dwell
Where rush the tidewaves of the sea,
Where storms will moan or calms will tell
To all the world our love for thee,
Whom all men loved in this old land,
And all men loved across the sea.
We well may clasp our brethren's hand,
And light the Beacon light for thee.

MR. DAVID BRYCE, of Glasgow, sends us a penny edition of Cruikshank's famous Progress of Mr. Lambkin (Gent.), Cruikshank for a penny being another concession to the democratic bookbuyer. To what extent the humours of this brochure will appeal to this generation we cannot say, but nothing has changed except the fashions. Lambkins we still have among us—half the fun of several weekly London papers is extracted from their misadventures—and Lambkins we shall have always. Priessnitz has gone, frilled waistcoats have gone, the corps de ballet is no longer what it was, the glory has departed from the Hummums, but human nature is stationary, and Cruikshank's pictures are still funny. Mr. Lambkin standing before the fire at the Mausoleum Club is masterly. The letterpress is more antiquated. How quaint is this: "Mr. Lambkin goes to a Masquerade as Don Giovanni, which character he supports to perfection. He falls into the company of certain Shepherdesses, who show the native simplicity of their Arcadian manners by drinking porter out of quart pewter mugs. They are delighted with the Don, who adds to the porter a quantity of Champagne, which they drink with the same degree of easy elegance as they do the Beer."

In our correspondence will be found two more letters on the subject of children's books. Next week we shall probably sum up the matter by giving a consensus of the opinions which have been expressed. Meanwhile, we may quote again Dr. Johnson's sentiments: "I would put a child into a library where no unfit books are, and let him read at his choice. A child should not be discouraged from reading anything which he takes a liking to because it is above his reach. If this is the case, the child will soon find out and desist; if not, he of course gains the instruction, which is so much the more likely to come from the inclination with which he takes up the study." But there are, of course, dangers attending this practice.

CONCERNING the remark of a recent lady correspondent to the ACADEMY, that Shakespeare's Poems were among her favourite reading as a child, a commentator thus rhymes in Punch :

Tell me, Lady—break it gently—
When but five, were you intently Letting ISEN brain-bewilder?
In one Doll's House finding pleasures,
Snubbing Jack's constructive measures
For an abler Master Builder.
Were you, as an infant, yielding
To the full-blown charms of FIELDING?
And when you were carried bed-ward,
(BERNARD SHAW's views notwithstanding),
Did you spout upon the landing
From a certain Lear—not EDWARD?
Did you—please excuse suggestion—
Write upon the Sonnet Question?
Nay, I ask it not in malice!
I, alas, could only glory
In some foolish Eastern story,
Or the Wonderland of Alice.

THE ranks of those who make books for children are to be increased by the addition of Father Tabb, the author of two tiny volumes of meditative and often beautiful little poems or versicles. Father Tabb has now written a book of Child Verse, which will be published this autumn.

THE cult of the garden, at any rate in literature, seems to be on the increase. The past two or three years have seen some notable gardening books, particularly, perhaps, Miss Jekyll's Wood and Garden and Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden by Mrs. Earle; and now, as the first of the "Country Life Library," comes the opening part of a comprehensive horticultural and arboricultural work, entitled The Century Book of Gardening. Therein are reproduced some of the brilliant photographs of old English gardens for which Country Life is famous, and among the contributors are Mrs. Earle and a number of well-known specialists. The book, which will be complete in twenty-six weekly parts, is published by George Newnes, Ltd. In scope—judging from Part I.—it is, perhaps, over-ambitious, since the small householder who really needs advice is somewhat crowded out in favour of the owner of beautiful and imposing pleasaunces, who, as a rule, leaves everything to his head gardener; but perhaps this fault will be remedied later.

IN A sturdy, stout little book at half-a-crown, bound in blue boards with a canvas back, may be found a reprint of the Arts and Crafts Essays, which, with a preface by William Morris, were first published in 1893. The whole makes a complete guide to the higher upholstery and decoration. Among the essays is that on printing, by Mr. Morris and Mr. Emery Walker, one or two points of which have, we fear, been neglected by the printers of the book before us. "Rivers," for example, we find again and again. This is, of course, only to admit once more that many of the counsels of these essayists are counsels of perfection. Morris's views on the formation of the page may still be new to many readers:

The position of the page on the paper should be considered if the book is to have a satisfactory look. Here once more the almost invariable modern practice is in opposition to a natural sense of proportion. From the time when books first took their present shape till the end of the sixteenth century, or indeed later, the page so lay on the paper that there was more space allowed to the bottom and fore margin than to the top and back of the paper, the unit of the book being looked on as the two pages forming an opening. The modern printer, in the teeth of the evidence given by his own eyes, considers the single page as the unit, and prints the page in the middle of his paper—only nominally so, however, in many cases, since when he uses a headline he counts that in, the result as measured by the eye being that the lower margin is less than the top one, and that the whole opening has an upside-down look vertically, and that laterally the page looks as if it were being driven off the paper.

It was a "gorging Lord Mayor's Show of volumes" that Mr. Boffin, the night the "friendly move" was inaugurated, in Our Mutual Friend, brought to the Bower to be explored by his literary man. He meant gorgeous, explains Dickens, but was probably misled by the association of ideas. It looks rather cheap, but (writes a correspondent) Dickens is pretty often justified by facts. Thus, outside Canning Town Station, the other night, there was to be heard an orator declaiming against the wrongs inflicted by the great shipowners upon the sailor-man. It is quite easy to guess the British institution by vague association with which the familiar "jobbery and chicanery" was changed, in the orator's mouth, into "jobbery and chicanery."

By the middle of next month the committee formed by Dr. Thomas Hodgkin to complete Hodgson's History of Northumberland will issue their fifth volume, edited by Mr. J. Crawford Hodgson, F.S.A. The volume deals with Warkworth and Shilbottle, situated on the north side of the famous angling river, the Coquet. Over the greater part of this territory the Duke of Northumberland, president of the committee, is lord, and the volume is enriched by documents from the ducal muniments, and plans and plates provided at his Grace's expense. Three members of the committee have written on special subjects—Canon Greenwell, of Durham, on the Coquet, and Warkworth Church; Mr. Cadwallader J. Bates on Warkworth Castle; and Mr. R. O. Heslop on the local dialect. Chapters on agriculture are contributed by Prof. Somerville, and on geology by Mr. E. J. Garwood, University Extension Lecturer at Harrow.

MR. RICHARD HARDING DAVIS's new volume, to be called The Lion and the Unicorn, may be expected this month. It will be a collection of short stories, both of war and peace. The title story is of peace and love and Bohemian life in London. The others include "The Last Ride Together," "On the Fever Ship," "The Man with One Talent," and "The Vagrant." The book will, we hope, be dedicated to Jagers, the boy messenger, whose fame Mr. Davis made, and who did what he could for Mr. Davis's in return.

THE Westminster Gazette has made arrangements to print a series of articles on topics of the day from the pen of Mr. Dunne and the mouth of Mr. Dooley. The first will appear on Monday next.

ACCORDING to an American paper, Mr. Alfred Austin is the Poet Laureate, Mr. Rudyard Kipling the Poet Litigant.

Bibliographical.

IF Mr. Charles Hiatt contrives to import into his Henry Irving: a Record and a Review, any notable elements of novelty he will deserve great credit, for the ground he proposes to cover has been often tilled. I fancy that the first book that dealt with Sir Henry's career was Mr. Austin Brereton's Henry Irving: a Biographical Sketch, published in 1883. This was at once elaborate and accurate, and was illustrated freely and well. Then came, in 1884, after the actor's first American tour, Mr. Frederic Daly's Henry Irving in England and America, and Mr. Joseph Hatton's Henry Irving's Impressions of America, Narrated in a Series of Sketches, Chronicles, and Conversations. It is understood that "Frederic Daly" was a nom-de-guerre of Mr. L. F. Austin, who, I believe, was at one time private secretary to Sir Henry. Mr. Hatton's book was, in the main, a clever essay in superior interviewing. It was followed, in 1893, by Henry Irving: Twenty Years at the Lyceum—the work of Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, who issued a second edition of it, with an additional chapter, in 1895.

The last named year also saw the publication of a brochure by Mr. Walter Calvert, called Souvenir of Sir Henry Irving, and suggested, no doubt, by the knighthood which had just been conferred upon the actor. Naturally there is a memoir of Sir Henry in Mr. Goddard's Players of the Period, as well as in all the other books or booklets dealing with the contemporary stage. There are glimpses of Sir Henry's personality in Mr. William Winter's Grey Days and Gold; and need I say what a wealth of biographical detail there is in the various interviews to which Sir Henry has been subjected, as well as in the lectures and speeches he has delivered, and in the magazine articles he has written? Verily Mr. Hiatt will have to select, rather than collect, the material for his "Record and Review."

Among forthcoming publications, it is said, will be a little volume of Reminiscences of Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, and Others, by the late Mrs. Lynn Linton. Will these be identical with the Reminiscences which Mrs. Linton contributed some time ago to one of the magazines? Because, if so, the volume will be little indeed. Let us hope that something more extensive is in store for us. In the later years of her life Mrs. Linton did a good deal of signed journalism. I wonder if it would be worth while to reprint some of the best of her effusions? One of the most vigorous of her later performances was the study of George Eliot which she contributed to Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign (Hurst & Blackett) in 1897. That, and the study of the Brontë Sisters which Mrs. Oliphant wrote for the same volume, might well be reprinted, and issued in a cheap form. Many people, I am sure, would like to possess them, for both are excellent of their kind.

The selection of Mr. Brander Matthews to write the biographical and critical introduction to the de luxe edition of Mark Twain's works may puzzle some people, but it is easy to understand. Though he takes, with us, no very high position as a critic, Mr. Matthews is very well known to English as well as to American readers, especially as a writer of short stories and as a commentator on the drama. Then, his Pen and Ink Papers were published in England in 1888, his Books and Playbooks in 1895; while among other volumes of his circulated in this country are his Americanisms and Britishisms, his Aspects of Fiction, and Other Ventures in Criticism, his Bookbindings Old and New, and his Introduction to the Study of American Literature. He writes a pleasant style, and, altogether, may be expected to "introduce" Mark Twain to us in agreeable fashion.

The promised book on the mediæval legends concerning Virgil as necromancer will be welcome, for, so far as my reading goes, the subject has not yet had very full treatment at the hands of any English writer. Most people have heard of the "treatise," published in English sometime in the sixteenth century, which professed to recount The Life of Virgil, and his Death, and many other Marvayles that he did in his Lyfetyms by Witchcraft and Nycromancy through the Develles of Hell. This was reprinted in 1812, and again by W. J. Thoms in his Early Prose Romances. Then, in 1893, we had The Wonderful History of Virgilius the Sorcerer of Rome, Englished for the First Time. A popular volume on the general subject should "take."

Mr. W. D. Howells has been quoting from the latest Canadian poet, Mr. Madison Caswein, a stanza in which occurs the phrase "bird-haunted garden." Is this not a little too suggestive of the "wet, bird-haunted English lawn" of a much greater poet?

With reference to two letters in last week's ACADEMY, I note Mr. T. B. Smart's suggestion that I should add to the information I gave about Matthew Arnold's "Old Playgoer" articles in the Pall Mall Gazette. May I suggest that Mr. Smart, as Mr. Arnold's bibliographer, might himself very well look up the files of the Gazette, and print the result as an appendix to his volume? Glancing through the Bibliography he compiled, I can see no entry concerning any of the "Old Playgoer" papers, though it was a matter of notoriety at the time of their publication that Mr. Arnold was their author. I see, by the way, that Mr. A. B. Walkley has just been quoting in an evening paper from some comments which the "Old Playgoer" made in the Gazette upon "Forget-Me-Not" and Miss Genevieve Ward.

As for Mr. Edwardes-Jones's communication, I have only to say that I never described the "Great Artists" series as "published" in the early nineties. I said they "appeared not later than" the early nineties, by which I meant that the last of them had been given to the world at a comparatively recent date—a good reason, as I thought, and think, for not starting now a series on the same subject.

A Change of Air.

Liquid Air and the Liquefaction of Gases. By T. O'Connor Sloane, Ph.D. (Sampson Low, Marston, & Co.)

DR. SLOANE'S book, to quote the rest of its title, covers the "Theory, History, Biography, Practical Applications, and Manufacture" of the substances with which it deals, and is a truly fascinating monograph on a fascinating subject. Not that he writes well; his style is much to seek, "suggestions" are "suggestive," and so forth: but he is clear, concise, and has his subject well in hand. The reader who has laid down the book feels that he really has—perhaps for the first time—a solid and well-rounded knowledge of the subject.

And what a subject it is! The whole popular conception, not merely of air, but of the nature and relations of the terrestrial world, is scattered to the four winds by a perusal of this book. "Airy nothing," "insubstantial as air," "invisible as air," and a host of colloquial expressions become utter misnomers; the ground is cut from under them. Air, indeed, has been "liquid" in the poets from time immemorial; but what was with them a metaphorical adjective is now matter of literal speech. To the question of Agur the son of Jakeh: "Who hath gathered the wind in his fists?" the modern scientist may answer "Even I." And if the latent force of the new discovery should be successfully applied to motion, sailors may yet traffic in winds, or their equivalent, without charge of witchcraft. Air is tinned and forwarded by rail; it may be delivered at your door with the morning's milk, though it were a harder matter to say what one should make of it. Here is the force of the snowstorm bound and sealed like the Arabian genie by that new Solomon, Mr. Tripler.

If hell consist (and we have Dante's word for it) in "fierce heat and in ice," then you can to a partial extent have a little hell of your own by entering M. Pictet's cold well, where you stand up to your neck in Arctic chill, like the spirits in the great Florentine's Malebolge. Winter is for merchandise; and during the present sultry weather M. Pictet might have done worse than bring it to London. Why go to the North Pole when you can have all the essentials at reasonable prices in Europe, without blubber, bears, and the chance of being cracked like an egg by ice-floes? With a little development you need not despair of having the North in your own back parlour, if you are of Falstaffian habit of body. Were Mr. Henley to rewrite his ballade of cool thoughts, he would certainly include this book among them. Hoar frost clinging round flasks by the mere cold of the liquid air inside them—think of it in the sweltering stone jug of Oxford-street or Fleet-street!

This is sport, fancy; but in very serious ways the trend of recent science, as exhibited by Dr. Sloane, revolutionises our physical conceptions. Science draws nearer and nearer to the ancient philosophy of nature, never lacking occasional firm adherents from Berkeley downwards; according to which the universe is a vast Chinese box or nest of boxes—not, however, mechanical and lifeless, but developing into and out from each other in a vast ascending and descending series. So the old Egyptians symbolised the universe by an onion, with its swathe within swathe. Thus, too, modern science is learning and teaching that there is no hard-and-fast division between the seeming—distinct substances which build up our mundane environment. Vapour must disappear and be recognised as one with gas. The invisible clouds of the dew are no less gas than hydrogen itself. Nor when we have thus simplified our division into solids, liquids, and gases do we reach finality. For all three pass into one another, and are none of them irreducible; solids, liquids, or gases are mere states of substance, depending for their existence on temperature and pressure. Alter these conditions and you alter the state; solid becomes liquid, liquid solid; fluid a gas, gas a fluid. Under pressure metals infiltrate each other like semi-fluids; though they be in no way reduced to fluid, though their metallic and immobile-seeming consistence be unaffected.

At a certain heat and pressure, again, solid elements become liquids, and the liquids in their turn gases. With a sufficient reduction of heat and application of pressure gases vice-versa are transformed to liquids, and thence to solids. Carbonic acid gas is made as water—expose it to the air and the released fluid falls in snowy mass. Our world maintains that form by which we know it through the bonds of temperature and pressure; release or affirm those bonds and that apparently inevitable form would give place to a wholesale, an inconceivable, transformation scene. The communication doors of nature have been set ajar by late discoveries, until to the unaccustomed lay mind it seems as if her partition walls were overthrown or falling; as if the solid earth itself were loosening beneath the footsteps of hurrying research.

It seems so, because the crowning liquefaction of air has awakened us suddenly to these matters from a long sleep of indifference. To science it is a gradual and no ways startling affair. Scientists have long been circling the walls of this Jericho, though they have fallen at last amid an amazing blast of trumpets. Temperature is the great factor in these attractive and magical-seeming results. Everything has heat of which it can be robbed, and alters its consistence with the robbery. The housewife cooling a jelly is the homely image alike of the scientist reducing a gas and the Creator preparing a world. The cold frog has neighbourly warmth to its fellow, and the iceberg its frosty fire. Dr. Sloane gives a striking illustration of this. Place on a block of ice a kettle of liquid air and the liquid boils. The ice boils it. As the poorest rhymster finds some to whom he affords the poetic thrill, so the ice is boiling hot to the yet colder liquid air. To bring down the heat of a gas is the essential towards liquefying it. The process is facilitated by pressure, which mechanically approximates the molecules of the gas. Practically, this is necessary in most cases; theoretically, cold alone is sufficient. It is our limitation of means which obliges us to add the help of pressure. In proof of this, when a vessel of liquid air is exhausted by a vacuum-pump, the intense cold set up causes air to liquefy on the outside of the tube and drip from its end. But to obtain it in quantity needs pressure besides cold. On the other hand, with some gases that are (in their normal condition) near the liquefying point—the critical state, as science calls it—pressure by itself is sufficient to liquefy them.

This explains why air and the higher gases (hydrogen, oxygen, &c.) remained unliquefied till our day—or at least is a main reason. Deceived by the liquefaction under pressure alone of such gases as chlorine, &c., the earlier chemists neglected temperature, and devoted all their attention to striving after enormous pressures. All through the century chemists have been toiling towards the goal finally reached in the liquefaction of air, and the substitution of cold for pressure as the chief agent was in truth the decisive turning-point.

Splendid fellows were those early chemists, with next to no apparatus, and amazing—nay, reckless—courage. Davy began his career by trying the curative effects of gases, not on his patients, but on himself. He got drunk that he might sober himself with laughing-gas. The laughing-gas proved no laughing matter: it burned his tongue, injured his teeth, and inflamed his throat. Presumably he was sober enough after that. But he was no whit warned. He next emptied his lungs of air, and inhaled carburetted hydrogen. Not being quite killed, when he recovered he tried carbonic acid gas, but was mercifully unable to swallow it. That was the kind of man he was. He did nothing in the liquefaction of gases, but showed extraordinary intuition as to the results which his successors might develop. Next came Faraday, who did liquefy a long list of gases, with no better means than pressure (applied by heat) in sealed and bent tubes of green bottle-glass. As Davy failed to poison himself, Faraday was equally unsuccessful in his persevering attempts to explode himself. His eyes were always full of cuts and fragments of glass, since whether his discovery came off or not the explosion seldom failed. He blew a test-tube to pieces as a preliminary to the liquefaction of chlorine. Yet he finally died in his bed, full of honours, discoveries, and bits of green bottle-glass. Thilorier distinguished himself by his apparatus for the liquefaction of carbon dioxide, made of cast-iron. This deprived him of the distinction of green bottle-glass in his eyes; but, on the other hand, it blew both legs off his assistant, so that he maintained the tradition vicariously. It was about time to try other methods than pressure; and Pictet of Geneva, with Cailletet of Paris, were the two men who introduced the modern liquefaction by cold and pressure.

So much will be clear to every lay mind, without entering on details of the complex apparatus for exerting pressure, which succeeded Faraday's simple method of making the gas supply its own pressure, by heating it in a closed test-tube. The modern method of acting by reduction of temperature, combined with pressure, is much more elaborate, and cannot be truly explained in brief limit. But keeping to the same lines of avoiding detail, both mechanical and scientific, we may give some idea of the general principle of action. There are two chief methods. The first (universal till quite lately) finds its earliest exemplification in the apparatus by which Pictet liquefied oxygen and hydrogen. The gas was allowed to provide its own pressure, by heating; but this was an error, and other methods of increasing the pressure have been used in more modern experiments. The distinctive feature was the application of cold. Roughly speaking, the principle was as follows: a circulation of cold gas was maintained about the tube into which the gas intended for liquefaction passed. The cooling gas in its turn was sheathed in a fresh circulating system of cold gas, and in this way a constantly increased degree of cold was set up. The details, as they may be studied in Dr. Sloane's book, are exceedingly ingenious. Upon this principle, of cycle within cycle of freezing gases, Prof. Dewar finally constructed his very elaborate apparatus at the Royal Institution, in which liquid ethylene played a principal part as regards the generation of cold. His success in thereby liquefying hydrogen, and finally air, in large quantities, is too recent to need recalling. The objection to his system is its great expense; and Mr. Tripler, in America, has now discovered a simplified and cheap means of manufacturing liquid air wholesale. Again omitting details, his essential principle may be thus broadly stated. The gas, reduced to a very low temperature, is brought finally into a cylinder lined with felt to prevent evaporation. Here it passes through coils of tubing, whence it is discharged into the cylinder by means of a specially contrived valve. Thus suddenly released from pressure, it expands rapidly, and the heat which it uses up in this expansion reduces it to a yet greater cold. Part of it ascends in the cylinder, and cools the coils through which fresh gas is passing. Part collects at the bottom of the cylinder, and by the perpetually increasing cold so set up, as gas continues to issue through the valve, is gradually liquefied. When a sufficient quantity has collected at the bottom, it is drawn off. This is the process of intensification, and by it the use of elaborate and expensive systems of freezing gases is avoided. The pressure is generated by means of a boiler; the air to be liquefied is drawn through the roof; and enormous quantities can in this way be manufactured at a comparatively small expense. The liquid air is placed in a tin, which is well wrapped with engine-felt, and placed inside another tin. The mouth is closed, and the air is ready for transport to any distance. The principle, it will be seen, on which this amazingly successful process is based is that a gas expanding by its own heat undergoes a rapid fall in temperature—rapid in proportion to the rapidity of the expansion.

So much for the principle of liquefaction, which in this very general statement may be understood by any reader. But what, after all, is the practical outcome of our liquid air, now we have got it? Well, at present, it must be said, not much. As if to recreate themselves after the labours of research, the first thing that scientists do with a discovery is to play with it. They have played with liquid air. They have, by its means, made indiarubber air-balls brittle as glass bulbs: they have made cups or tumblers out of frozen whiskey; they have burned in it the most unburnable things; they have shown its explosive power; they have, in fact, astonished a marvel-loving public to its heart's content. But beyond a suggestion that it may be used to replace dynamite as an explosive, there are but two practical results of any consequence. It is capable of being used, instead of the knife, to amputate tumours, &c.; though it needs skilled handling. And M. Pictet claims that liquid air can be used to cure dyspepsia. A dyspeptic generation will not underrate such a boon as this. Liquid air is a solution of force, with endless potentialities, would science observingly distil them out. And now that she has finished playing with it, science undoubtedly will.

In the French East.

Tunisia and the Modern Barbary Pirates. By Herbert Vivian. (C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd. 15s.)

In the first five chapters of his book Mr. Vivian describes Tunisian life under the heads of its history, the Bey, the MIDDLE-CLASS WOMAN AND SERVANT IN TUNIS.

Barbary pirates, the Arabs, Islam, and Jews and Niggers. It is only in his sixth chapter that he describes his arrival at Tunis. This arrangement is not resented by the reader, who is early made aware that Mr. Vivian's originality is not grown less nor his natural exuberance abated. Mr. Vivian never forgets that he edited the Whirlwind; and, really, we do not know why he should forget it. What the reader does resent is the expression of some unworthy and reckless opinion, as when Mr. Vivian says, by way of casual illustration: "Just as you have only to set eyes upon a Yankee to know him for an impudent vulgarian, so the first sight of an Arab suffices to convince you that he possesses every instinct of a gentleman." There is nothing Arabian about this sentence, and Mr. Vivian had better not have written it, if only because it betrays him. The memory of it remains to weaken many a criticism of the French authorities in Tunis.

Not everything that Mr. Vivian tells about Tunisia is peculiarly Tunisian. In his chapters on the Arabs, and on Islam, he describes customs and ceremonies which are common to other countries in the Near East. But this was inevitable, and the merit of these pages lies in the brisk observation which he brings to his task.

Tunis came under French protection in 1881. The old Bey is still living, a mere cypher, in the great palace at Marsa. Mr. Vivian compares him to an extinct volcano. He is, however, nothing so majestic. A mere French puppet, the old man comes to Tunis every Monday morning to see the French Resident and receive French officials. He goes to them, not they to him. The French allow him £37,500 a year, and deny him visitors as much as possible. Only in the days of Bairam, the holiday which follows the fast of Ramadan, does the Bey recover even a semblance of dignity; and even then the French officials who gather round his gilt throne "make no effort to avoid turning their backs to the straw sovereign." If they only flouted the Bey it would be a small matter, but Mr. Vivian has much to say against French methods in Tunis. Spy-mania is rampant in the country, and to go out without your passport is as much as your liberty is worth. Mr. Vivian tells us that Sir Lambert Playfair, when he was British Consul-General in Tunis, was once stopped when he was without his passport; and it was only by offering to write himself out one that he escaped arrest. Sir Lambert had a pretty jest at the expense of the French authorities. He would take up a coin and read out the legend thus: "Liberté point. Egalité point. Fraternité point." The general prospects of the colony struck Mr. Vivian as poor:

If Tunisia is to have credit as a French colony, it must be colonised by Frenchmen. This the authorities understand, and they constantly endeavour to devise means whereby French agriculturists may be induced to come. But, with the best will in the world, they do not contrive to present a very attractive picture. I have in my hand a pamphlet which they have issued for distribution among persons contemplating emigration. It begins by setting forth the superior advantages of Tunisia over America and other fields of colonisation: the beneficent climate; the absence of fevers, savages, prairie fires; and the presence of the French flag to afford protection and the feeling of home. But it goes on to lay great stress upon the futility of coming over without capital, intelligence, and industry, the possession of which three blessings would, however, enable most men to do well anywhere, without the need of emigration. There are not even free concessions of land, or subsidies of any kind. Necessaries, with the exception, perhaps, of bread and the worst imaginable meat, are no cheaper than in the average French provincial town; while all luxuries, down to the very smallest, are infinitely dearer. Practically the chief form which French colonisation has taken so far has been little more than a species of camp-following. Wherever a French garrison establishes itself, a number of tawdry shops, rough eating-houses, and dismal places of entertainment creep into existence. No doubt the proprietors rapidly enrich themselves by the sale of inferior goods at prices calculated to repay them for the burthen of expatriation; and if this satisfies the aspirations of French expansion, there is no more to be said.

Mr. Vivian's strictures are often more lively than convincing; and an undercurrent of malice has to be allowed for again and again. Thus, Mr. Vivian says that the French monks at Carthage stop archaeological discovery by a dog-in-the-manger policy; but instead of proving this, he sneers at their costume—"a ridiculous combination of fezzes and white flannel"—and compares Cardinal Lavigerie's cathedral to a "glorified Brixton villa."

It is when he paints the Tunis of to-day that Mr. Vivian's youth and spirits serve him best. Very clear and many coloured is the picture of Tunis which rises before us in these pages. The dazzling white town, the long white mantles of the natives, and the proudly erect carriage which even the beggars do not lose, the stately strutting camels, the donkeys laden with oranges, the Arab horses hidden under enormous loads of olive branches, the gay nights among the cafés which close the austere days of Ramadan—all these are described with a light hand and a seeing eye. Mr. Vivian's description of the shops in Tunis is alluring:

Never had I seen anything to compare with the natural aestheticism of their arrangement or the brilliance of their colours. Most charming of all were the fruit-shops, with rows of light blood-oranges festooned upon the rafters; clusters of chillies, like prodigious fairy-lamps, illuminating the dark corners; and great racks of glistening dates upon the counters. Even the butchers' shops were picturesque, and it was always a fascination to watch the cross-legged Arabs plying their esparto-switches to keep off the flies, who foregathered even in mid-winter. The hemp and rope-shops presented a fascinating array, as did the ironmongers', with rusty chains and huge keys in clumsy locks all dangling at the doors. Driving along, there were charming peeps into native coffee-houses, where rows of turbaned dignitaries lay wrapped in contemplation or played unruffled games of cards.

The beggars of Tunis are many, but Mr. Vivian gives them a better character than Miss Lynch gives to those of Toledo. They are mostly Bedouin women, who run about Tunis in scanty attire.

"By the head of thy wife," they exclaim to an obviously newly-married man, "give me sous. By the head of madama, give, I say. By thy head, give. . . ." They never seem to tire of their chorus, but will run for miles by the side of a carriage or dance before a traveller, carefully impeding his way as he walks through the narrow streets of the Arab quarter. They pluck at his clothes, like greedy hens attacking a feed of corn, and spread their glistening teeth in front of his face, or display a bundle of mouldy babies under his nose. But they are always boundlessly good-natured, and keep their patience though they be tantalised by the hour. From a bird of passage they will never take "No" for an answer; but when they come to know you, and to understand that you are generally good for a few coppers, they may be relied upon for the finest manners in the world. You have but to appeal to them as old friends, telling them that you are not in a generous mood to-day, but to-morrow you will see what you can do, and they instantly scamper off in search of another victim.

Mr. Vivian is much more convincing when he unfolds the picturesque in Tunis than when he is condemning Lord Salisbury's "blunders" in foreign policy, or telling us that though Bizerta will soon be admirably fortified against sea attack, it will be cheaply at the mercy of any force we may choose to land on the coast to the south.

In nothing that we have said do we wish to imply that this is not a delightful book of travel notes. Mr. Vivian is always controversial, he is never dull. And if any brightness, not his own, were needed, it is found in the photographs which Mrs. Vivian took during their sojourn with the benign and turbaned Tunisian, and in her excellent account of a visit to a harem in the Arab quarter. The photograph we reproduce needs no explanation.

A Great Town.

The History of the Castle, Town, and Port of Dover. By the Rev. S. P. H. Statham. (Longmans.)

THERE was a time, it is generally allowed, when the Britains were coherent with the continent of Europe. Dover on the one side, and Calais on the other, represent to our minds the last points of contact. In the midst of the shallow sea that has thrust them apart is still to be traced the bed of the river whose valley has been flooded by the encroaching tide. The sense of proximity has never been blotted out; from the beginning Dover has been magnetically conscious of a neighbour just out of the range of vision—a neighbour and a possible enemy; has been consciously burdened, therefore, as the geographical vanguard or watchtower of the Britains; so that when Caius Julius Cæsar, pursuing victory to the ends of the earth, with the 7th and 10th Legions aboard his eighty transports, cast anchor in the Roads, he found “the armed force of the enemy stationed on all the hills.” In the third century the British fleet, maintained as the first line of defence against Saxon pirates, had its principal places of rendezvous in those harbours known later as the Cinque Ports and the Two Ancient Towns; and thenceforward it is as the principal member of that Corporation that Dover figures in English history.

Dover in the time of King Edward [the Confessor] rendered 18 pounds; of which moneys King Edward had two parts and Earl Godwine the third. . . . The burgesses gave the king 20 ships once a year for 15 days, and in each ship were 20 men. This they did in return for his having endowed them with sac and soc. When the king's messenger came there he gave them for the passage of a horse 3d. in winter and 2d. in summer; but the burgesses found the pilot and one other to assist him, and if he wanted more it was hired at his own cost. From the festival of St. Michael to that of St. Andrew the king's truce was in the town, and if anyone broke it the Reeve received a common amend. Whoever resided constantly in the town, and rendered custom to the king, was quit of toll throughout all England. All these customs were there when King William came to England.

This is the record of Domesday Book, and Mr. Statham shows reason for attributing the grant of these privileges to King Alfred. “Sac” signifies the right of trying all causes, civil and criminal, in their own courts; “soc,” the complementary right of haling uitlanders before the same tribunals. The Corporation reached its full stature in the thirteenth century, when Edward I. ordained that his ships should exact from all who voyaged in the narrow seas the homage of a salute. To the parliament summoned by Simon de Montfort the Cinque Ports Corporation sent four barons each—every burgess was a baron—twenty-eight in all. In the time of Elizabeth Dover seems to have fallen upon evil times. Twenty-one vessels she had been wont to furnish. Demand was made of five and a pinnace. Alack! she sent but one; and the balance was ludicrously shadowed by five pinnaces. Let us hope that the solitary ship was a big one.

The domestic life of the town was shaped mainly by two principal preoccupations. It was necessary, in the first place, to fulfil the traditional obligation of national service; in the second place, it was desirable by every lawful means to secure the best of the herring business, and particularly against the ignominious rivalry of upstart Yarmouth. Thus in 1338 it was patriotically enacted by the Warden that “within seven leagues of the sea in Kent only one bell should ring in churches, so that, in case of attack, all might be warned by the ringing of all bells.” And so late as 1703, by the Assembly,

It is ordered that six men do watch every night.
No person [proceeds the enactment] shall be hereafter admitted a freeman . . . that at the time of demanding his freedom is not resident in the Town, so as to be liable to the Scot and Lot, Watch and Ward of the Town.

Decreed [finally] that for the better security of the Town, a good watch be kept in the night-time by the inhabitants, and for default of any inhabitant, being duly warned, he shall forfeit one shilling to be levied by distress.

So it was of the utmost importance that what Captain Burrows, in our own day, calls “the law of eastward drift” should be frustrated. In the time of James I.

Personal service was demanded of the inhabitants . . . and in 1676 the “ancient custom” was revived, by which the mayor used to summon every householder by beat of drum to resort to the harbour with a shovel to clear the obstruction caused by the accumulation of shingle.

Even at this hour the last word of engineering ingenuity is energising against this same plaguy shingle. And it may be hoped that soon the lamentable tendency of the beach to “get into the harbour's mouth” will be chastened and corrected. Only one remembers that in “the grating roar of pebbles which the waves draw back and fling, at their return, up the high strand,” bringing “the eternal note of sadness in,” a poet found inspiration:

The sea of faith
Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
Lay like the folds of a bright girdle folded.
But now I only hear
Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,
Retreating, to the breath
Of the night-wind, down the vast edges drear
And naked shingles of the world.

The republican sentiment was manifested early in Dover: it was the first town to take up arms against Charles I. Similarly, it was Puritan in its views, and foreign refugees from the rigour of Catholic governments found ready hospitality within its bounds; at different times three foreign Protestant congregations were provided with meeting-houses. And so early as 1539 the municipal revenue was swelled by the sum of £29 7s., realised by the sale of Catholic ornaments pertaining to the church of St. Martin-le-Grand. That there was, none the less, a strong conservative element in the corporate mind is shown by the fine of £200 “sett upon Mr. Richard Barley, one of the Jurates of the Towne, for endeavouring, by bloweing the Horne, to alter the established government of the Corporacion, contrary to the decree of the said Corporacion” (1678).

The office of Constable of the Castle has been united since 1226 with that of Warden of the Cinque Ports. The Constable's primary business was the defence of the Castle. He must see that all the holders of knights' fees performed their service regularly and efficiently; and when a fixed payment was substituted for personal service, it was his business to collect the sums due for “castle ward.” A proper flag was hoisted on collecting days; and he whose rent was not paid before sundown was assessed in the double. The Constable was commander of the garrison, and enjoyed authority to deal, to the utmost, with extreme cases. The prestige inherent in the office is manifest in the list of the Constables appended to this volume. Odo is there; Langton; Villiers, Duke of Buckingham; George, the consort of Queen Anne; the younger Pitt, Palmerston, and the Duke of Wellington. To-day the distinguished Constable of the Castle, since 1895, is Robert Arthur Talbot Gascoyne Cecil, Marquess of Salisbury.

We have done much less than justice to Mr. Statham's book. It is no mere gossipy chatter; it is a serious history of a place which, from the earliest historic times, has been for us the key of international intercourse. The book is the work of a man who reverences her stones, and has found no pain too heavy if only he might build up again into the likeness of truth the scattered fragments of her corporate life.

Spanish Facets.

Contemporary Spain. By Mary Wright Plummer. (Truslove, Hanson, & Comber.)

MISS PLUMMER has hit upon an interesting literary device. Assuming that America, having beaten Spain and being now at rest, is eager to learn something about the defeated enemy, this lady has selected from a number of Spanish novels passages descriptive of Spanish life, and has brought them together under various headings in the present volume. It is as though one should display England by means of paragraphs from Thackeray and Mrs. Humphry Ward, Mr. Gissing and Dickens, George Eliot and Sir Walter Besant. Such a book would no doubt be interesting, but we cannot honestly say that we want to see it published. Similarly, Miss Plummer's book is interesting although somewhat snippety. But, also, it is very incomplete, partly because Miss Plummer has drawn only upon those novels that happen to be translated into English, and partly because novelists do not cover all ground in their stories. Still, she offers illumination, from Valdés, Bazan, Galdós, De Alarcón, and Valera, on religion, politics, scenery, customs, and society; and it is one's own fault if at the end of the book one knows nothing of the country of the bull-fight, the fan, the mantilla, and the cigarette.

The cigarette, indeed, leads to a realistic description, from Valdés' Sister Saint Sulpice, of a Spanish tobacco factory:

The room which stretched out before my eyes was very impressive, and tended to make me timid. Three thousand women were seated in the vast vaulted hall. . . . It was almost impossible to breathe in that place; the atmosphere could have been cut with a knife. Numberless rows of women, young women especially, all wearing thin calico dresses of manifold colours, all with flowers in their bosoms, were rolling cigarillos upon large tables that shone from the much rubbing of hands. Many of them had beside them wooden cradles with young babies sleeping. These cradles, as Nieto told me, were furnished by the factory itself. Some of the women were nursing their young ones. The type of all these women had very little variation: round, dark cheeks, turned-up noses, black hair, and very black, wicked eyes. . . . That human hive hummed and buzzed, producing in the heavy, asphyxiated atmosphere, laden with nauseating odours, a dull and disagreeable roar. Above this roar could be heard the chicheo with which the assemblage saluted me. The agile fingers moved swiftly, rolling up the poison with which all Spain would soon be contaminated.

Spain is, of course, one of the countries where the women do the work. At Bilbao, for instance, the tramp steamers which carry iron ore are laden by women while the men lounge about smoking these same cigarillos. Miss Plummer has no passage to this effect, but it is so.

Here, from a long description of the spectators at a bull-fight, from Galdós' Leon Roch, is a picturesque passage:

Above, in the boxes, there are more white mantillas, some covering gray heads, others framing the sweetest specimens of youth and beauty; fiery carnations or starry jasmine in their hair, cheeks like blush roses, eyes black or blue, with lashes quivering like butterflies; cherry lips, a glance as fickle as the light nod of a flower in the wind, and smiles that reveal teeth like pearls; the all-pervading fan with its wordless telegraphy in a thousand colours. This forms the bewildering charm of all large assemblages in Spain—the same in the boxes of a theatre as in the balconies over the streets—whenever there is a procession or a spectacle, or whenever a king makes his entry or takes his departure to do honour to a brand new constitution.

While a novel by Valera, Don Braulio, gives us the Spanish view of such spectacles:

In short [he sums up], the death of the bull is fine if the matador strikes true and gives it no more than two or three stabs; but frankly—and I am speaking in all sincerity, nor am I given to rodomontade or sentimentality—all the preliminaries are an abomination, view them as we may. And yet, and in spite of all this, bull-fights will not cease. We ourselves would not dare to demand their suppression, for there is something national and romantic about them which appeals to us. We would be content with certain reforms if such were possible.

We commend the passage to the notice of the English contingent who applaud the miserable exhibition now given each Sunday by the bunglers of Boulogne.

To come to matters of more ordinary nature, we learn from Miss Plummer's book that the Andalusians hold the record for long engagements:

Here [says Valera in Doña Luz] are to be found cases of engagements dating from the time when the lover began to study Latin at school, continuing during his studies in polite literature, law, or medicine, and terminating in marriage only when he becomes judge of the lower court or titular physician. . . . I have heard it related of another lover, a native of Carcabuey, in proof of the firm conviction entertained in that part of the country that matrimony requires a great deal of consideration before entering upon it, that his future mother-in-law, reflecting that her daughter had been for thirteen years receiving his attentions without his ever having proposed to her, and that she was beginning to decline in her looks, resolved to ask the lover what his intentions were. And having summoned the necessary resolution to ask the question, the lover responded, very much surprised and a little displeased: "Good heavens, señora! Is it at the suggestion of some secret enemy of mine that you ask me this question?"

Finally, let us quote a general statement from Valdés' The Marquis of Peñaalta:

. . . A country where everything is pardoned except contradiction. But among the honourable pleasures conferred by the Supreme Creator upon the heroic Spanish public there is none more keen and delectable than that of breaking the laws and programmes which they have freely imposed upon themselves. In this particular, sybaritism has reached the point of making itself every morning some rule for the pleasure afforded by breaking it in the afternoon.

And here we leave a warm-blooded little book. We shall be much mistaken if one effect of Miss Plummer's ingenuity is not to send a great many persons to Spain on journeys of discovery of their own.

Keate.

A History of Eton College. By Sir H. C. Maxwell Lyte. Third Edition. (Macmillan.)

THIS encyclopædic history of Eton promises to be a progressive work, gathering into its pages with each successive edition whatever of old Eton lore may be brought to light, and adding new history as it is made. The second edition (1889) was a marked advance on the first (1875), containing, as it did, extracts from Dr. Keate's correspondence, and from a diary kept by a member of his family during the doctor's headmastership; and assistance was forthcoming from Mr. Gladstone, Lord Curzon of Kedleston, and other old Etonians. The present edition is improved by the fact that the author has been able to examine a version of the Nugæ Etonenses belonging to Sir R. Payne Gallwey, a series of letters from Sir Michael Hicks-Beach belonging to his niece, Mrs. Portal, &c. Recent works on Eton have also been used, as Eton of Old, which presents a capital picture of the college in the years 1820-1830; and Mr. A. D. Coleridge's Eton in the Forties. Mr. L. Vernon Harcourt's unrivalled collection of books and pamphlets relating to Eton has also been explored. Thus the book has grown considerably, apart from the increase (amounting to about thirty pages) entailed by bringing the narrative up to recent date. The last event now recorded is the somewhat laggard formation, in 1898, of an Old Etonian Association.

Though ponderous, Sir Maxwell Lyte's volume is entertaining throughout. The chapter on Dr. Keate is particularly good and just. The dumpy doctor has been too much regarded as an executioner. Sir Maxwell Lyte is able to give a few stories, comparatively unfamiliar, which show that Keate had his fits of good temper, and that in unguarded moments he could be amiable. It is said that he freely pardoned a boy named Dallas, who had thrown a stone at him in school, on his apologising. "When two small boys pleaded, in excuse for being late for 'absence,' that they had been to see Gray's monument at Stoke Poges, he inflicted no punishment, and good-humouredly expressed a hope that they would turn out as good poets as Gray." One of these boys, as it happened, became his son-in-law, but no poet, although his name was Chapman. However, such stories are few; and posterity must find an offset to Keate's ferocity rather in the fact that the boys frequently took a "rise" out of their headmaster. In 1829, when boating was still a forbidden pastime, it became known that Keate meant to waylay an eight as they rowed up to Surly Hall, and punish (i.e., flog) the boys for their disobedience. Unfortunately for himself, he allowed his purpose to be known, and the boys contrived to hoax him effectually. On the appointed day, a crew of watermen, dressed up to represent the Eton "eight" and wearing masks over their faces, started from the Brocas, in the presence of a crowd of townspeople who had come out to see what would happen. Keate caught sight of them from the bank before they had reached Upper Hope, and shouted: "'Foolish boys, I know you all! Lord —, I know you. Watt, you had better come ashore. Come here, or you will all be expelled.' The boat, however, pursued its course steadily, several of the masters giving chase on horseback, and the ruse was not discovered until the crew disembarked and took off their masks with a loud 'hurrah.'"

Keate did not take such defeats good-humouredly. On this occasion there was a rather inconclusive inquiry, resulting in eighteen floggings and other punishments. Still more enjoyable are the stories of Lord Norreys, afterwards Earl of Abingdon, who used to impersonate Keate (an easy thing to do), and go about in the evening in a cocked hat and gown spreading terror among the other boys. "One night he took a pot of red paint and therewith bedaubed the door of William Heath, one of the assistant masters, no one daring to interfere"; and once he went so far as to call absence at one of the dames' houses. The most serious charge which Sir Maxwell Lyte allows to remain at Keate's door is that he indirectly encouraged untruthfulness. He had no faith in schoolboy honour, and used to make charges of lying at random. One boy, being so charged, actually sent Keate a challenge to a duel, and was finally expelled—to become a colonel in the Scots Guards.

Keate's reputation seems to rest on a kind of noble average, struck on all his acts. When he retired the boys presented him with three pieces of silver worth £600. Keate was "for once fairly overcome; too much affected to return thanks, he gave vent to his feelings by taking off his cocked hat, the only occasion on which that symbol of authority was ever known to be raised to anyone." There is a magnetism in Keate's figure that will never be weakened. Not for nothing did he stand only five feet high, and wear clothes "partly resembling the costume of Napoleon, partly that of a widow-woman." For we English love a humorous contradiction, and the majesty of Eton suffers naught by being concentrated and caricatured in the person of this absurd little man, of whom it was said that he "flogged the son of a duke and the son of a grocer with perfect impartiality, and was thoroughly manly and right-hearted in the depths of his nature."

Fiction.

To London Town. By Arthur Morrison
(Methuen. 6s.)

MR. MORRISON'S new story is pleasant, but it marks no advance in his art. His reputation still stands upon Tales of Mean Streets and A Child of the Jago. In those books Mr. Morrison had things to say, definite phases of life to describe, and he did his work well, with some probing of the deeps. Here, in To London Town, he is merely a superficial narrator: nothing is proved.

The story is concerned with the fortunes of a poor widow and her son. Left to her own resources, the widow opens a grocer's shop near the docks, and the boy is apprenticed to a firm of engineers. The widow marries a loafer and bully, who, after the boy has thrashed him, turns out to have another wife living, and disappears. The boy falls in love with the daughter of a notorious female drunkard, and the book ends happily. That is practically all. Now, with insight and good writing, it would be enough, but without them it must seem rather bald. And bald To London Town is. Mr. Morrison, as we have said, has merely narrated: he has not also demonstrated. We know hardly any more at the end of the book, than we did at the beginning, of Johnny and his mother. The book is not thorough, not complete; and the one comic character in it—Uncle Isaac—is sheer Dickens.

Fortunately, however, To London Town has a prologue, and in that Mr. Morrison gives us some rather nice work. The central figure of this prologue is an entomologist and retired postman, Johnny's grandfather, upon whom Mr. Morrison has spent more pains. This is a pretty passage:

"But I should like a trade where I could make something," the boy would answer wistfully. "I really should, gran'dad."

"Ah"—with a shake of the head—"make what? I doubt but you're meanin' pictures. You must get that notion out of your head, Johnny. Some of them as make 'em may do well, but most's awful. I see 'em in London often, drorin' on the pavement; reg'lar clever ones too, doin' mackerel an' bits o' salmon splendid, and likenesses o' the Queen, an' sunsets, with the sky shaded beautiful. Beggin'! Reg'lar beggin', with a cap out for coppers, an' 'Help gifted poverty,' wrote in chalk. That won't do ye know, Johnny." . . . Putting the letter-carrying aside for the moment, and forgetting distance as an obstacle, what trades were there to choose from? Truly a good many; and that none should be missed, Johnny's grandfather took paper and a pencil and walked to Woodford, where he begged use of a London Directory and read through all the trades, from absorbent cotton wool manufacturers to zincographic printers, making a laborious list as he went, omitting (with some reluctance) such items as bankers, brokers—stock and share—merchants, patentees, and physicians, and hesitating a little over such as aeronauts and shive turners. The task filled a large part of three days of uncommonly hard work, and old David May finished his list in mental bewilderment. What was a shive turner? Indeed, for that matter, what was an ammeter?

The list did but multiply confusion and divide counsel. . . . It afflicted Johnny himself with a feeling akin to terror, for which he found it hard to account. The arena of the struggle for bread was so vast, and he so small a combatant to choose a way into the scrimmage! More, it seemed all so unattractive. There could be little to envy in the daily life of a seed crusher or a court-plaster maker. But the old man would pin a sheet of the list to the wall, and study it while he worked within doors; full of patience and simple courage.

"Bakin'-powder maker!" he would call aloud to whomsoever it might reach. "How's that? That's makin' somethin' . . ."

Were all Mr. Morrison's characters as carefully and sympathetically treated as his old naturalist his book would be a good one. As it is, it leaves no more impression than the ordinary manufactured story.

A Son of the State. By W. Pett Ridge.
(Methuen. 6d.)

THIS is a volume of the sixpenny series to which Messrs. Methuen give the title of "The Novelist," and if you can grapple with sixpenny print and like to have paper wrappers on your shelves, well and good. So much for the form. As for the matter, parts of it, like the curate's egg, are excellent. Bobbie Lancaster, "a short, acute-faced boy with a peakless cap," is a budding Hooligan. Some of his pranks in this capacity are quite entertaining, and the conduct of the story affords Mr. Pett Ridge the opportunity of working in some humorous treatment of slum life. Take, for instance, the evidence of Mrs. Rastin at the inquest on Bobbie's mother:

The coroner went on: "And you knew the deceased?"
"Intimate, sir."
"Was she a woman with—er, inebriate tendencies?"
"Pardon, sir."
"I say, was she a woman who had a weakness for alcohol?"
The sergeant interpreted. "Did she booze?"
"She liked her glass now and again, sir," said Mrs. Rastin carefully.
"That is rather vague," remarked the coroner. "What does 'now and again' mean?"
"Well, sir," said Mrs. Rastin, tying the ribbons of her rusty bonnet into a desperate knot, "what I mean to say is, whenever she had the chance."
"You were with her before the accident?"
"I were."
"You had been drinking together?"
"Well, sir," said Mrs. Rastin impartially, and untying her bonnet-strings, "scarcely what you'd call drinking. It was like this. It were the anniversary of my weddin' day, and brute as Rastin always was, and shameful as he treated all my rel'tives in the way of borrowin', still it's an occasion that comes, as I say, only once a year, and it seems wicked not to take a little something special, if it's only a drop of—"
"And after you had been together some time you walked along Haberdasher-street to East-street?"
"With the view, sir," explained Mrs. Rastin, "of 'aving a breath of fresh air before turning in."
"Was the deceased the worse for drink?"
"Oh, no, sir! No, nothing of the kind." Mrs. Rastin was quite emphatic. "She felt much the better for it. She said so."

Presently Bobbie falls into the hands of the law, and is sent, for his good, to some industrial cottage homes. Then the reader has a shock. Bobbie develops a conscience and self-respect. With occasional backslidings he becomes a credit to the "rates," and, joining a training ship, is, in the last chapter, a naval hero. The story is perhaps too idealistic, but it is a worthy pendant to Mord Em'ly.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE KING'S MIRROR. By ANTHONY HOPE.

In this book Mr. Hope fuses in the manner of The Prisoner of Zenda and the Dolly Dialogues, and is yet more serious than in either. Adventures are here, but in small quantity; piquant conversations between a witty man and a woman are more frequent; but the strength of the book is its frank revelation of character. The king's mirror is another word for the king's autobiography, the king being Augustus of Forstadt, monarch, humorist, cynic, and gentleman. (Methuen. 6s.)

QUINFORD. By ARTHUR H. HOLMES.

A quiet novel of village life, in which the heroine has to choose between two lovers. The motto of the story is taken from "Pippa Passes": "So, I grew wise in Love and Hate, From simple that I was of late." (Unicorn Press. 6s.)

WHEN ROGUES FALL OUT.

By JOSEPH HATTON.

This is "a romance of love and crime" in the days of Jack Sheppard. Jack and Jonathan Wild divide the honours of the story, the dark shades of which are relieved by what the author calls "the picturesque humanity of Newgate." Mr. Hatton has gone to all the authorities in literature and art for facts and backgrounds, not omitting the broadsheets of the day. It is a little odd, therefore, that he should almost leave his readers under the impression that it was at Newgate that Jack Sheppard was hanged. The long, historic ride to Tyburn is but faintly indicated in about a dozen words. (Pearsons Ltd. 6s.)

A BITTER HERITAGE.

By J. BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.

Unlike the author's last story, His Own Enemy, and many of his romances, this story is modern, and is laid in British Honduras, whither the hero, a young naval officer, proceeds with a view to discovering what is the true secret of his birth. The narrative is full of weird adventure. An English heroine, a French woman from New Orleans, and a semi-savage half-caste girl supply the feminine interest. (Cassell. 6s.)

THE MAN'S CAUSE.

By E. N. LEFROY.

Tennyson's lines:

The woman's cause is man's: they rise or sink
Together, dwarfed or godlike, bond or free, supply the title. A serious novel, embodying a plea for the better understanding and consideration of women, and worthier efforts on the part of all. In the foreground, life in a country house. (Lane. 6s.)

A GENTLEMAN PLAYER.

By R. N. STEPHENS.

The gentleman player is Hal Marryott, and the story is of his adventures on a secret mission from Queen Elizabeth. Marryott played Laertes in the first performance of "Hamlet," which is here described, and was a friend of Will Shakespeare. Shakespeare, indeed, is in this book too, and vocal. This is his conversational manner: "Love," says he, "is a flame of the fashion: the first sight of a face will kindle it in shape of a spark. An there be no further matter to fan and feed the spark withal, 'twill soon die, having never been aught but a spark, keen though its scorch for a time; a mere seedling of love, a babe smothered at birth. But an there be closer commerce, to give fuel and breeze to the spark, it shall grow into flame, a flame, look you, that with proper feeding shall endure for ever . . .", and so forth. (Methuen. 6s.)

IN MONTE CARLO.

By HENRY SIENKIEWICZ.

A short story by the voluminous author of Quo Vadis and Children of the Soil, translated by S. C. de Soissons. Readers who here expect a piquant narrative of gambling will be disappointed. The tale concerns a painter Svirski and his relations with certain of the sex. On the last page he takes hold of both her hands and looks into her eyes with a great tenderness. (Greening. 2s. 6d.)

BLAKE OF ORIEL.

By ADELINE SERGEANT.

Blake, of Oriel, goes with a scholarship from a North London Board-school to Oxford, where his brilliant talents procure him the worship of a band of undergraduates, and admission into their homes as a sort of divinity. But Blake is a sham. He has latent in him the criminal instincts which he has inherited from his father, of whose crimes and present existence he had been kept in ignorance. Father and son are brought together under dramatic circumstances. The story becomes more improbable as it advances; but it will grip many readers. (F. V. White & Co. 6s.)

SOME LEADING FEATURES OF THE SERIES.

The primary aim of the Series is to supply cheap, attractive, and practical editions of the more ordinary school classics.

Introductions are short and interesting, containing (a) a life of the author; (b) some account of his works generally; and (c) a notice of the special work under treatment.

Text.—A sound text is given in every case, but textual criticism has been avoided except where the MS. is of some general interest, historically or otherwise.

Notes are as brief as is consistent with the proper elucidation of the text. In this respect the practical aim of the Series as School Editions has been strictly kept in view.

Appreciation of Contents.—To this end careful attention has been paid to typographical arrangements. Marginal analyses have been given, together with useful summaries (in Appendix) collecting results of what has been read—e.g., tabulation of similes in Vergil, of military terms in Xenophon, and chronological tables.

Farcimosum Eruditio; or, The Instruction of Sausages.

BEFORE we discuss things, it is always well to discuss terms, and, so far as possible, to define them. This is more than usually true in such a matter as Education, which is so complex and contentious in itself, and so commonly misused, both in thought and practice. The best treasury of terms, in scholarly English, is Johnson's Dictionary; and, if we turn to that, we find a distinction set up at once, by Johnson and his authorities, between Education and Instruction. The first is defined as "Formation of manners in youth; the manner of breeding youth; nurture." The second is defined as "The act of teaching; in formation." In the last word of each definition we find the contrast between Education and Instruction. One has to do with nurture; the other, with information. Johnson again, quoting from Hooker, records the following piece of good sense: "Education and instruction are the means, the one by use, the other by precept, to make our natural faculty of reason both the better and the sooner to judge rightly between truth and error."

So far as Education is the "formation of manners in youth," we may put it on one side, because manners are no longer taught, and are hardly practised, especially by teachers. It is an old maxim, that "Manners makyth man": manners, in Wykeham's phrase, connoting morals; and the remaining fragments of both are now being devoured apace by the twin monsters, Democracy and Plutocracy, who in the end will disagree mortally with one another, and bring back "Universal Darkness."

In the meanwhile, in this reign of the precursor, "dullness," we may confine ourselves to the subject of instruction. The great fault of our present methods of instruction is, that its victims are crammed with isolated and unconnected facts, while nothing is done to educate their minds. This fault prevails through our whole scheme of instruction, from our primary schools to our so-called universities. The former are not at present our concern. We need only say, that unhappy infants are literally gorged and overloaded with dull facts. They are crammed with superficial primers, which play over the surface of many subjects and really explain none of them; and no one subject is either taught thoroughly for its own sake, or as an instrument for educating the mind, and teaching its owner how to think. This vicious practice was brought in by the system of payment by results, which, together with the examination system, has been the ruin of education, especially at the universities.

In those venerable places the degree used to be a pledge that the recipient had lived for some long time at his university, and had gone through a leisured scheme of exercises and studies, in which he had shown publicly his industry and skill. The degree meant that its owner had lived in a certain atmosphere, and been steeped in it. Nowadays, it means little more than that he has satisfied a board of examiners; and his powers are tested by examination papers, in which luck, or health, or nerve, or a dozen other accidents, may be more decisive than parts or learning. Examinations, we make bold to say, are the ruin of education. It is not our business to suggest an alternative to them. We merely point to their defects. These are similar in kind, and worse in degree, than the defects we have noted in primary education. A university student has now to dabble in too many subjects; he, therefore, plays over the surface of them all; he never goes below the surface of any one; he, too, depends on primers and half knowledge and cram. Besides, so great is his pressure of time and subjects that he cannot linger by the way, nor follow any line of investigation for himself, nor work thoroughly at any subject, nor indulge his curiosity and taste. It would be as dangerous to know more than his examiners as to know less than their conventional and external questions. The method of dealing with such questions has been reduced to a fine art. Given a subject and a set of text-books and a few terms' experience, and the professional crammer knows to a nicety what will, and what will not, be set as questions in the schools. He reduces his cunning to a system, and sells it in the form of lectures. After a time he may improve it still farther, and sell it in the form of a primer to a larger audience. All this is of great fame and use to the professional crammer. It may lead him in time to Parliament or into the Cabinet, as in the case of Robert Lowe; but it is of less use to the intelligence of the persons crammed. When the classics are taught in this way they cease to be literature; they do not convey high thought or a large experience of men and things; they are not, as they were, litterae humaniores, studia humanitatis et litterarum. Their humanity is not perceived; their literature is not caught; they are little more than vehicles for conveying pedantic information, in the German manner, by means of notes on archæology and grammar.

English literature, too, is attempted in the same way. It is either an instrument for teaching philology or for dissecting history. Shakespeare, for instance, seems to be annotated and taught only that we may perceive his anachronisms and his blunders in geography. Wordsworth might be used as a guide to botany, and Keats to astronomy. When great authors are taught by lectures for the purposes of examination, it is difficult to see how any other results can be obtained, except those which Mr. Gosse proclaimed when he was Clark Lecturer.

That philosophy should be taught in this way is even more ludicrous. To have every philosopher indigested into short notes, to listen to chatter about his system and all other systems, is offensive and absurd. How much sounder to learn any one system thoroughly, to possess the mind and method of any one great master, and to be able to apply it through life to other systems, to the whole range of philosophy and thought. This was the old, sound way, and it is still the best. It was and, we believe, is the way in the Scottish universities.

A similar way should be followed in the classics, and in our own literature. Instead of learning about the Greek and Latin authors, or cramming them in crowds, we should steep ourselves in one or two, until we possess him. This was the old way. Our predecessors, with all their faults or failures, carried something of the classics into their lives and writings. They quoted them in Parliament, or made pretty mottoes to their essays, or used them happily in talk and letters. At the best, they caught their mind and style, and wove them into the texture of their own thoughts and writing, as Thackeray used his Horace. It was in this way that the little essayists and minor poets of last century used their models. If they knew nothing but Horace or Virgil, they made a fine use of him, and conveyed him, to our profit, into their own work.

Of education, in Johnson's meaning of the term, we have too little. Our instruction is little more than a sausage manufactory, in which the chief and only art is to cram as many raw fragments as possible into a given void; which they fill, indeed, and over-fill, but by which they never are assimilated. This result, perhaps, is what we might expect from Germanic methods of education, and German tastes in pursuing and satisfying them. From this, the passage is easy to the concoctions of filth and folly in Laputa; but, in describing them, we should trespass into the realms of science, with which we have neither space nor inclination to deal at present. We will only quote Johnson's eulogy of Socrates: "It was his labour," he says, "to turn philosophy from the study of nature to speculations upon life; but the innovators, whom I oppose, are turning our attention from life to nature. They seem to think that we are placed here to watch the growth of plants, or the motions of the stars. Socrates was rather of opinion that what we had to learn was, how to do good and avoid evil"; or, for our present purpose, how to acquire good literature and avoid the evil of bad systems and bad teachers; how to be educated instead of merely instructed, or stuffed like sausages with meat which we never shall digest, however much we may be "varie et minutim concisâ carne referti." G.

The Reading Class.

I took down my old school Reader the other day, and turned its pages. Lines that have haunted me through life were there, and somehow I marvelled to find them in the same old places on the page. Old fancies and dim apprehensions and boyish flights of fancy came back: the book had the charm of a diary. Ineffaceable impressions! Ineffaceable? Yes; but how dull and trivial and irrelevant many of them seemed! How curiously selected, those fateful passages of prose and verse!

I had a vision of my sufferings in the long hot afternoons when we stood up, thirty-six of us in a line. IRACUNDUS sat at his desk, and stroked his beard, and played with the destinies of the afternoon. What would he select? "The Death of Hume" or "Joy Over One Sinner," or "Robinson Crusoe's Method of Making Bread," or Miall on "Political Monasticism"? Many of the pieces in the Reader were so forbidding that I marvelled—not that IRACUNDUS made us read them, but that he endured to hear them read; that he could calmly order us to declaim Dr. Arnold on "Classical Education" when the "Story of Le Fevre" was possible. His choice made, he called the page, and we turned to it in hope and fear. What stones we found in place of eggs! To hope for "Skating—a Man In!" and to find Hallam on "The Effects of the Feudal System"! To have willed "Sir Roger de Coverley at Home" (and some of us held that IRACUNDUS' choice could be silently influenced), and to be confronted with a sermon by Dr. M'Cosh! It was all very well for IRACUNDUS, who at five o'clock would go home to do what he liked and prepare for a good dinner; but to us these selections were mere incomprehensible visitations of dulness. There were pieces so arid and improving that even Hawthorne's essay, "A Rill from the Town Pump," seemed exciting. It was the Town Pump of Salem, that talked through its spout in a blend of temperance lecture and reminiscence. One passage is graven on my memory. A gouty old gentleman having taken a drink, the Pump soliloquises:

What! he limps by without so much as thanking me, as if my hospitable offers were meant only for people who have no wine cellars. Well, well, sir; no harm done, I hope. Go, draw the cork, tip the decanter; but when your great toes set you a-roaring it will be no affair of mine. If gentlemen love the pleasant titillation of the gout, it is all one to the Town Pump. This thirsty dog, with his red tongue lolling out, does not scorn my hospitality, but stands on his hind legs, and laps eagerly out of the trough. See how lightly he capers away again! Jowler, did your worship ever have the gout?

Oh, the humour we forced into this question to Jowler! As the reader of the moment stumbled toward it, the laughter of thirty-six youngsters was set on a hair-trigger, and when the question was at last enunciated with the stock accent, the explosion was instant. No iteration could stale the jest, and it is odd to think that now, when we are separated by seas, and gulfs wider than seas, we each revert to that preposterous oasis in the reading lesson—"Jowler, did your worship ever have the gout?" The Pump goes on to babble about the days when it was a crystal spring. "Indian sagamores drank of it from time immemorial." This word sagamores pleased me hugely. I did not know what sagamores might be, but gradually visualised them as tall ancient Indians with brown skins and white beards, and heads full of the wisdom that is not in books, and the picture serves me still.

Endicott and his followers came next, and often knelt down to drink, dipping their long beards in the spring. The richest goblet, then, was of birch bark. Governor Winthrop, after a journey afoot from Boston, drank here out of the hollow of his hand. The elder Higginson here wet his palm, and laid it on the brow of the first town-born child.

This passage aggravated our schoolroom thirst. But I was fascinated by the elder Higginson, who struck me as an excessively superior person, whose palm, not the water, was the means of grace.

Oratory had a prominent place in our Reader, and some of us were not averse to declaiming the speeches of Chatham, Burke, Brougham, and John Bright. The gem of the speeches was Lord Thurlow's "Reply to the Duke of Grafton." It was so short that one boy had the whole of it to himself; and its splendid scorn, and crescendo of self-respect, brought the opportunity for much vocal display. A note in the book explained that the "Duke of Grafton had, in the House of Lords, reproached Lord Thurlow with his plebeian extraction." I am not sure that I had the clearest idea of what "plebeian extraction" might signify, but I perfectly grasped the statement that "Lord Thurlow rose from the Woolsack and advanced slowly to the place from which the Lord Chancellor addresses the House," and that he "fixed his eyes upon the Duke." Who does not know by heart that lofty reply beginning: "My Lords, I am amazed; yes, my Lords, I am amazed at his grace's speech" (the Reader assigned only a small g to his Grace), and ending thus:

Nay more, I can and will say, that as a peer of Parliament, as Speaker of this right honourable house, as Keeper of the Great Seal, as Guardian of His Majesty's conscience, as Lord High Chancellor of England; nay, even in that character alone in which the noble duke would think it an affront to be considered, but which character none can deny me—as a MAN, I am at this moment as respectable—I beg leave to add, as much respected, as the proudest peer I now look down upon.

Twenty-three years are annulled as I read the old footnote which assured us that "the effect of this speech, both within the walls of Parliament and out of them, was prodigious." Another speech was John Bright's great philippic against the "incapable and guilty Administration" which had rushed the country into the Crimean war. The passage in which he thrilled the House of Commons, by pointing to the gaps which the war had made on its own Benches, has a perennial beauty:

Here, sitting near me, very often sat the member for Frome, Colonel Boyle. I met him a short time before he went out, near Hyde Park Corner. I asked him whether he was going out? He answered, he was afraid he was; not afraid in the sense of personal fear—he knew not that; but he said, with a look and a tone I shall never forget, "It's no light matter for a man who has a wife and five little children." The stormy Euxine is now his grave. On the other side of the house sat a member with whom I was not acquainted, who has lost his life, and another of whom I knew something, Colonel Blair. Who is there that does not recollect his frank, amiable, and manly countenance? Well, but the place that knew him shall know him no more for ever.

Even here (such are the curious workings of a boy's mind when receiving new impressions) the thing that dwelt with me was the fact that John Bright had met Colonel Boyle "near Hyde Park Corner." I had yet to see London, and this picture of one man meeting another man near Hyde Park Corner warmed my imagination far more than "the stormy Euxine," which, indeed, savoured of geography.

The contentment with which a boy will accept a collocation of words to which he can attach no meaning, but which he vaguely enjoys, is remarkable. Thus, in Lamb's essay, "In Praise of Chimney Sweepers," we were advised to give the small chimney-sweep twopenny, but "if it be starving weather, and to the proper troubles of his hard occupation a pair of kibed heels (no unusual accompaniment) be superadded, the demand on thy humanity will surely rise to a tester." Kibed heels! a tester!—how sagely some of us read these words, understanding them not at all. Coleridge's "Hymn Before Sunrise in the Vale of Chamouni" opens with the lines:

Had thou a charm to stay the morning-star
In his steep course? So long he seems to pause
On thy bald, awful head, O sovran Blanc!
The Arve and Arveiron at thy base
Rave ceaselessly.

During several years I believed the Arve and Arveiron to be a pair of witches or wizards; and perpetually I wondered what it was they raved about ceaselessly. The selection of poetry was not inspiring for boys of fourteen. We had passages from Shakespeare, Milton, Goldsmith, and Cowper. But we seemed to be always reading Mrs. Alexander's "Burial of Moses," Gray's "Elegy," and an egregious and insincere temperance poem by Dr. Johnson (who ought to be ashamed of himself for writing it), beginning:

Oh, water for me, bright water for me,
Give wine to the tremulous debauchee.

It is a pity that the "Elegy" is put before boys, to be conned and monotoned until their chance of enjoying it in middle life is lost. To boys the whole poem is unreal, and its effect is but to freeze the genial current of their souls.

Rarely, rarely, came the spirit of delight in those reading classes of the late seventies! Once I was under the spell of literature; once there came a reading which left more than a phrase to pursue me through life. It ended with these words: "The genius making no answer, I turned about to address myself to him a second time, but I found that he had left me. I then turned again to the vision which I had been so long contemplating; but, instead of the rolling tide, the arched bridge, and the happy islands, I saw nothing but the long, hollow valley of Bagdat, with oxen, sheep, and camels grazing upon the sides of it." And remembering the spell which the "Vision of Mirza" threw over me in the great schoolroom, I have thought that such impressions should have been many, not few. That they were few seems to have been no fault of mine. Our Reader was in all things too improving: its essays were dry and its stories flabby, and little that was spacious or beautiful to a boy's apprehension was to be found between its covers. Of romance hardly a hint. When I find that I can return to such pages with affection, I am led to wonder whether the ideal school Reader exists—a Reader which with psychological insight gives boys the best and strongest they are able to receive, yet plays tenderly on tender minds. He who compiles a school Reading-book has a great opportunity. Has that opportunity been fully taken? I merely ask. Z.

In some states, as a consequence of the violent movements experienced in almost all directions, there has come about a certain overpressure in the system of education, the harm of which will be more generally felt hereafter; though even now it is perfectly well recognised by capable and honest authorities. Capable men live in a sort of despair over the fact that they are bound by the rules of their office to teach and communicate things which they look upon as useless and hurtful.—Goswami.

Professions for Boys.

THE picture of the British parent with a son of fifteen to launch into life is a rather pathetic one. He is confronted by innumerable wicket-gates, each of them guarded by a gentleman in cap and gown holding a packet of examination papers, and by another gentleman, no less terrifying and important, jingling a still hungry bag of sovereigns. Through which of these wicket-gates shall he propel his progeny with any certainty that, admittance gained, the path will lead to a competency and an honoured old age? How, even, with the crowd of other anxious parents jostling him, is he to come near the wicket-gates at all? It is to aid the parent in estimating the difficulties, the expenses, and the chances by the various professions that Messrs. Pechell and Nolan have compiled their volume on Professions for Boys (Beeton & Co.), of which a second and enlarged edition has just appeared.

The first thing that strikes one in turning the pages of this work, which is severely prosaic and statistical, is the amazing number of careers open to the British boy wherein he may be reasonably sure of making a comfortable living. The second thing to give the reader pause is the fearful tangle of examinations through which the British parent must project a speculative eye before he can choose his son's career. There is, perhaps, something encouraging in this to those who rejoice in the opening up of all professions to brains, and scorn the days when money bought entrance, and interest secured promotion. It is as though the army, the navy, the Church, and the stage, to say nothing of the Institute of Chartered Accountants, the profession of dentistry, and the agricultural interest, should offer a delightful income on an ascending scale to any youth who can make 60 per cent. of the marks on an examination paper. One might imagine that as education is, technically, free—and education is the key to all the professions—the British parent might give his son a free choice. But if the parent reads this book with the attention it merits, he will find to his dismay that the education which the Civil Service Commissioners, for instance, require is by no means free, and that not even the Church is open to the aspiring candidate without an outlay which must run into several hundreds of pounds.

Take, for example, the army. Purchase in the army has been abolished for a generation. But what happens when the parent determines to send his son into the army by way of Sandhurst. There are several public schools which take the boy of fifteen into an army class and pass him successfully through the entrance examination to Sandhurst? The average boy, however, will not get through without the crammer's aid, which will cost anything up to £500. Expenses at Sandhurst will amount to about £150 a year, while outfit, uniform, books, &c., will account for something like another £200. So that the newly-joined subaltern has cost his father, as a rule, about £1,000 since he left school. Wherefore the parent gains little from the abolition of the purchase system. To enter the navy is somewhat less expensive. From the time he proceeds to the Britannia training ship, to the day when he is appointed midshipman, the naval officer will have cost his father about £800. Furthermore, it must be remembered that neither the sub-lieutenant in the navy nor the subaltern in the army can possibly subsist on the pay he receives from the nation he fights for.

More cheerful, at the first glance, is the prospect offered to the British parent by the Civil Service. There are sixty thousand civil servants in the United Kingdom alone, and everyone of these can live on his pay so soon as he has won his appointment. Moreover, the first class Government clerk has a very generous pay to live upon, while the Indian civilian is worth "four hundred a year alive or dead" so soon as he has satisfied the examiners.

But in spite of all that has lately been done to amalgamate the examinations for Home and India Civil Service and to raise the age of admission so as to open the competition to the best men from the Universities—in spite of all this, the crammer has not been eliminated. And the parent who would see his son a member of the finest Civil Service in the world must not only have a son whose brains are well above the average, but he must also have a purse that will stand a pretty considerable drain.

Looking further down the list of possibilities, we find every Government appointment, in Patent Office, Office of Woods, Excise, and Courts of Justice is hedged by an examination; that candidates are so numerous that only the best prepared can succeed, and that special preparation implies special expense. Outside the Government service, too, the man in cap and gown meets the youth at every gateway. Suppose, for example, he wishes to be an accountant. The Institute of Chartered Accountants confronts him—in cap and gown—with a Preliminary, an Intermediate, and a Final, in which he must show knowledge of the rights and duties of liquidators, trustees, and receivers; of the bankruptcy law, and the law of arbitration and awards, as well as of some such subject as botany, animal physiology, or electricity. Even the bank clerk is encouraged to present himself for examination, and it is only a question of time for the farmer to flaunt a degree at the weekly market.

On the whole this volume opens a somewhat appalling prospect to the British parent, seeing that nearly every profession but that of the stockbroker involves an examination, or even several examinations; the unpleasant chance of failure when it is too late to change, and the certainty of heavy fees for special preparation. And the Stock Exchange, with its necessity for plentiful capital and heavy guarantee, is not a profession for the million. At the end of the volume, however, the parent may find some small consolation. If his son has failed for the navy, the army, and the civil services; if he show no disposition for architecture, the stage, or fruit-growing in the Channel Islands, if he cannot obtain even a post as secretary or teacher, he may, provided he be of good physique, obtain a billet in the Natal police, wherein "the mental examination demands intelligence." Supposing, too, that his intelligence has not reached the requisite pitch by the time he is thirty, he has five more years in which to qualify for the Durban police. If he cannot satisfy this test by the time he is thirty-five, one might almost despair of finding him a profession at all, were it not that our authors have dropped a curious little article on "The Church Missionary Society" into the closing pages of their book. From the missionary, as from the stockbroker, no examination is required. But his wife, for obvious reasons, must be suitable; and we gather that the hire is worthy of the labourer.

Text-Books, School Books, &c.

English Books.

Selections from the Sources of English History. Edited by Prof. C. W. Colby. (Longmans.)

THE object of this book is to give the student a notion of the kind of materials out of which his Bright or Gardiner or Ransome or Oman is constructed. It consists of a series of extracts, translated where necessary, from important historical documents, from chroniclers, and from letters, diaries and the like, such as the "Paston Letters," contemporary with the events they record. Prof. Colby's selection, his bibliographical notes on the writers quoted, and his introduction on the study of first-hand literary material are all admirable, and the book must be highly recommended to any teacher who wishes to make the study of history a living thing. Its only fault is that, as it covers the whole course of English history, the extracts are necessarily neither long enough nor numerous enough; and here it is at a disadvantage when compared with the little series of "periods" compiled, if we remember rightly, by Prof. York Powell and others, under the title of "English History from Contemporary Writers." We are rather amused to find Prof. Colby, who writes for boys "sixteen years old," telling them that they may meet with some unfamiliar allusions, "but few which a glance at the Encyclopædia Britannica will not clear up." Prof. Colby holds a chair at the McGill University. Surely boys of sixteen do not, in America, use the Encyclopædia Britannica as an habitual book of reference!

Julius Cæsar. Edited by Mr. Brimley Johnson. (Blackwood.)

THIS book is intended for junior forms, and Mr. Johnson has attempted to concentrate interest upon the story of the play without dwelling unduly upon the minutæ either of philology or of literary criticism. The introduction is full, but hardly explanatory enough for the class of readers aimed at. We observe a mistake of "Macklyn's Diary" for "Machyn's Diary." The notes are numerous and very brief; but there are already a score of school editions of Julius Cæsar, and there is no very marked distinction between Mr. Johnson's and several of these.

Lays of Ancient Rome. Edited by J. H. Flather. (Pitt Press.)

EXCELLENT as this Reader is, it can hardly be said to supply a felt want. The Lays, however, although Matthew Arnold did call them "pinchbeck," are an excellent initiation into literature, and we are glad to find boys encouraged to read them. Mr. Flather has supplied all the information that could conceivably be required in addition to Macaulay's own prefaces and notes.

English Etymology. By Dr. F. Kluge and Dr. F. Lutz. (Blackie.)

THIS is not a treatise, but a "select glossary." The authors write: "We have confined ourselves to selecting all words the history of which bears on the development of the language at large. We have, therefore, in the first place, traced back to the older periods loan words of Scandinavian, French, and Latin origin, and such genuine English words as may afford matter for linguistic investigation." The book should prove a powerful rival to the well-known "Concise Dictionary" of Prof. Skeat, to whom, of course, the authors, as they gracefully acknowledge, owe much. The relation of English words to their Teutonic and Romance relatives is very clearly and simply set out, and as the arrangement is alphabetical, the glossary is a much more practical one to consult than Prof. Skeat's learned and original volume. Of course, however, it is not quite so complete. The authors throw out a useful hint to teachers when they suggest the value of dealing with a group of words at a time. "Special interest attaches, for instance, to words of early Christian origin, to the names of festivals and the days of the week. Besides these, the names of the various parts of the house and of the materials used in building, the words for cattle and the various kinds of meat, for eating and drinking, &c., might be made the subject of a suggestive discussion. On treating etymology in this way, the teacher will have the advantage of converting a lesson on the growth of the English language into an inquiry into the history of the Anglo-Saxon race, thus lending to a naturally dry subject a fresh charm and a deeper meaning." There are some fascinating studies in this mode of treatment in Prof. Karl Pearson's Chances of Death. Mr. Lyde has taught geography to 200 pupils a day for twelve years, and has examined 25,000 candidates in the subject during the last five years. Therefore he ought to know something about it.

Geography of Africa. By L. W. Lyde. (Black.)

EXCELLENTLY lucid and well-arranged. Mr. Lyde is to be commended for the care he takes to bring out the dependence of the civilisation of countries on their physical features, and for his wise decision to exclude small maps from his book, thereby sending students back to their neglected atlases. On the other hand, a little more anthropology would not have been amiss. Among the general chapters on Africa as a whole might have been included one on the main divisions and relationships of the native peoples.

Blackwood's Literature Readers. Edited by John Adams. (Blackwood.)

MR. ADAMS has gone to great pains in collecting extracts, and has compiled some ingenious questions upon them. We should have thought, nevertheless, that the obvious classics of the schoolroom, which, however hackneyed to older readers, are often all new to every fresh generation, would have served the educational purpose just as well as some of his more out-of-the-way selections. The "First Reader" contains some rather amazing things. It opens with an extract, translated from the German, in which occurs the phrase, "Edward slept hardly any that night"; and in an account of Polyphemus, "adapted from Homer," the child is told that the Cyclops had "one long eyelash going from ear to ear." We cannot think whom the "Fourth Reader" is meant for. A boy or girl capable of appreciating snippets from Sterne and Izaak Walton and Samuel Butler should not be reading snippets at all.

The Adventures of Beowulf. Paraphrased and edited by Miss Clara Thomson. (Marshall.)

THE introduction, giving an account of the conjectured early Teutonic life and poetry, is admirable; the paraphrase itself a little less so. Miss Thomson is too much under the dominion of a Latinised vocabulary; and you can only paraphrase Beowulf by sticking as closely as possible to the Anglo-Saxon. William Morris, in his best moods, should have been the model.

Selections from Addison's Spectator. Edited by Mrs. Martin. (Blackie.)

THIS is an abridgment of an earlier selection by Mrs. Barbauld, and most of the introduction is Mrs. Barbauld's also. The volume is a useful addition to Messrs. Blackie's marvellously good and cheap "School and Home Library."

Kant on Education. By Miss Annette Churton. (Kegan Paul.)

HERE we have the somewhat scrappy notes for Kant's lectures on "Pædagogics" brought out by his pupil, Theodor Rink; and Mrs. Rhys Davids has contributed a suggestive introduction on the bearing of Kant's views, and especially on their relation to the revolutionary doctrines of Rousseau.

Latin.

Virgil: Georgic III., and Virgil: Æneid XI. Edited by T. E. Page, M.A. (Macmillan & Co.)

MR. PAGE has here given, in his additions to this well-known series of Elementary Classics, examples of careful and thorough editing. Every possible difficulty is explained, and all allusions of the most learned of ancient poets carefully unfolded. The vocabularies are sufficiently full, that to Æneid XI. being the work of Rev. G. H. Hall, whose philological suggestions are sufficient for beginners—pegs on which a teacher could hang much useful and pleasant learning for apt pupils. The introductions, which, of course, are for the most part identical, are good, and the literary comparisons made or suggested throughout them and the notes are excellent. Either would be a good term's work in Latin poetry.

The Æneid of Vergil. Book XII. Edited by A. Sidgwick, M.A. (Cambridge: University Press.)

THE editor's fine scholarship and critical faculty are again shown in this little book, and his handling of the last is not less admirable than that of the first book of the great Roman epic—which latter we reviewed just a year ago. Writing for learners more mature than Mr. Page's, the style is more severe, and the teaching perhaps more systematic. We notice as particularly useful the notes on similes and on subjunctive uses, and the index to the notes.

Vergil's Æneid. Books I.—III. Edited by W. Coultts, M.A. (W. H. White & Co.)

MR. COULTTS has taken great pains with this edition, and has made it certainly useful for the lower forms of schools. The Life shows much reading, and is pleasantly written, and the summaries give the story at considerable length. We think the addition of a vocabulary, where so large a part of the poem is read, of doubtful value: a dictionary, and a good one, is required. The notes are full, but simple, confined almost entirely to points of grammar and translation. We regret that we cannot give more praise to what is evidently the fruit of much labour and thought.

Cæsar de Bello Gallico. Book III. Edited for Beginners by E. S. Shuckburgh, M.A. (Cambridge: University Press.)

THIS, and the companion volume, Book IV., by the same editor, may be noticed together. They belong to the same series as Mr. Sidgwick's Vergil in separate books, and are thoroughly well done. The historian of Rome, whose Elementary History is one of the best introductions we know to its subject, naturally dwells specially on the historical aspects of his author; and the sketch-maps and illustrative drawings are excellent features. The notes are good and short, and the modern names of Gaulish places always given. Maps of France, to face those of Gaul, would make the book complete. The introduction to Book IV., in itself the most interesting to English boys, is even better than that to Book III.

Satura Grammatica; or, Latin Critical Notes. By E. G. A. Beckwith, B.A. (Bell & Sons.)

THE author's modesty disarms criticism of these somewhat unsystematic notes, which are avowedly only practical hints on grammar, for the use of candidates for military examinations. The work of such a book can only be tested in practice, but it deals with an astonishing variety of points, and is always clear, and generally correct. There are, however, some obvious misprints: Lewis (and Short)'s Dictionary we know, but not Lewes, and "shake" reads queerly for anguis (p. 67).

Greek.

Xenophon: Anabasis IV. Edited by G. M. Edwards, M.A. (Cambridge: University Press.)

WE have nothing but praise for this admirable little book. Introduction, notes, and vocabulary are all equally good. Points of history, grammatical uses, and Greek military and social customs are all made clear and interesting, and no better edition could be desired for schoolboys of this masterly narrative of one of the greatest achievements in ancient or modern warfare. The translations given in the notes deserve special praise.

The Medea of Euripides. Edited by P. B. Halcombe, M.A. (Blackie.)

MR. HALCOMBE has here made a bold attempt to simplify a great Greek play by cutting out the choruses, and connecting the iambic portions by current English prose. It is doubtful whether such an attempt can succeed, and a lover of Greek poetry rather resents it. Apart from this sentiment, the work is excellent, and the book is thoroughly well equipped for beginners.

Plato: Ion. Edited by J. Thompson, M.A. (Camb.), and T. R. Mills, M.A. (Oxon.). (W. B. Clive, Univ. Corr. Coll. Press.)

THIS is a very happy result of scholarly co-operation, and a valuable addition to the texts annotated for the London University examinations. A useful introduction gives all information required for understanding the beautiful dialogue that follows; the text is admirably printed; and the very full notes leave nothing to be desired. As the student of Plato must have a considerable knowledge of Greek, there is no vocabulary. The little paragraph on the Socratic method (p. 15) deserves to be singled out as an excellent piece of condensed comment, and the running analysis in the notes is most helpful.

French.

The Study of Colloquial and Literary French. By P. Shaw Jeffrey, M.A. (Whittaker & Co.)

IT is impossible in our limits to do justice to this book, which is a thorough-going, comprehensive, and detailed method of study. Founded on the German work of Dr. Koschwitz, it has been modified to suit the more direct and practical, if less scientific, needs of our own people. It deals, with admirable fulness, with every department of the study of French—language, history, and people; gives the best authorities, native and foreign (alas, that so few are English!); summarises the standards of examination and the courses of instruction in our own country; and points out with clearness and precision the best way of following these up by residence and study abroad. The concluding bibliography is particularly good, and we heartily commend the book to all interested in any part of its subject.

A Historical French Grammar. By Arsène Darmesteter. English edition by Alphonse Hartog. (Macmillan.)

THE early death of the author of this book was a severe loss to European language-study, as was that of his equally famous and gifted brother James to Oriental letters. But this part of his work has been carefully revised and completed by the competent hands of MM. Muret and Sudre, and, as now put into English dress, deserves a hearty welcome. Based originally on lectures delivered to classes of young women, the book is one of admirable lucidity and profound learning pleasantly conveyed. The growth of the language, in its pronunciation, word-forms, and syntax, is traced with the firm hand of real genius through every stage, from the rough speech of Roman settlers in Gaul to the polished, copious, and elegant language of modern France. The most fascinating division of the work is that which deals with the formation and life of words (Book III.), while the most learned and useful, as also the most difficult, is that which deals with the phonology—the progressive development of sounds. Students of scientific French grammar will join with the present book—to confine them to English authorities—Brachet's Historical Grammar and Dictionary, in the latest editions; these three books will give them all that is needed for a sound introduction to French philology.

Historical French Grammar. By Ernest Weekley, M.A. (Blackie & Son.)

PROF. WEEKLEY has done a great deal of excellent work in promoting the study of French, as we have often had pleasure in showing, and the present little book is a useful addition to that work. Like most of what he has done, it is prepared for the use of those studying for the examinations of the London University, and is well calculated to meet their requirements. The laws of sound and of word-formation, and the historical accidence, are stated and illustrated as clearly and fully as his narrow limits will allow; and the chapter on metre, which closes the book, is a valuable contribution to a subject too much neglected.

Songs of Béranger. With Introduction, Notes, and Vocabulary by George H. Ely, B.A. (Blackie & Son.)

THESE seventeen songs from the genial French chansonnier are delightful, and give us views of his many-sided joyous and tender nature. The short introduction gives all that is wanted to understand the man and his work, the notes explain everything that might be unfamiliar, and a vocabulary makes the little book complete. It would be hard to find a nicer class-book.

Les deux Bossus. By Henry Carnoy. Edited by Emile B. Le François. (Blackie.)

HERE we have a delightful fairy story, nicely printed, and carefully edited for children. The reward of good temper and the punishment of envy, as shown in the opposite fates of the two hunchbacks, should convey wholesome instruction to opening minds.

Les Violettes Blanches. Par Emile Richebourg. Edited by F. Julien. (Macmillan.)

THIS is, like others of this Primary Series, a charming and simple story, that of the struggles and love of a young peasant who becomes a famous artist, and it is well chosen for children. The vocabulary, however, should be completely revised, as at present it is neither complete nor quite correct. We have also missed notes on some grammatical points that require them. It is a dangerous thing to omit from a vocabulary words of similar form in both languages (pp. 60, 61), as the shades of meaning are often very different.

Cinq-Mars. Par Alfred de Vigny. Adapted and edited by G. G. Loane, M.A. (Macmillan.)

THIS new volume of Siepmann's Series is a welcome addition to it. The plan of the series is now well known, and has again been excellently carried out. Cinq-Mars is, perhaps, the very best example of the romantic school of historical fiction in France, and is a delightful story in Scott's manner. To bring it within the editor's limits, he has been obliged to give only the main story, but this has been skilfully done. The introduction, though short, gives a very good view of the historical setting of the plot, and the notes are satisfactory.

Picciola. By X. B. Saintine. Edited by Arthur R. Ropes, M.A. (Cambridge: University Press.)

MR. ROPES is an excellent editor, and this pretty new edition of Saintine's story should revive its old popularity as a school book. The notes are clear and brief, and every point of difficulty seems to be disposed of; while the introductory note gives a sufficient account of the book and its author. Mr. Ropes, we observe, no longer refers to any special French Grammar.

French Historical Unseens. By N. E. Toke, B.A. (Blackwood.)

THIS is an admirable choice of pieces for translation at sight, and will be found useful for all classes that have mastered the elements of French. The historical extracts, averaging a page each, deal with the most interesting facts of the history of France, from Henry IV. to 1871, and are gathered from the masters of French prose. The second part of the book is made up of an equally well-made choice of extracts from general literature, a sketch of the history, lives of authors, and historical and biographical notes.

Elementary French Grammar. By Charles S. Le Harivel. (Oliver & Boyd.)

WE have here the elements of French grammar simply presented, the rules being clear and the examples and exercises well-framed. There is, however, no special feature to distinguish it from others of its class. The treatise on pronunciation, strangely enough, leaves much to be desired—e.g., the remarks on l final, ti, the nasal sounds, and the accents, are either defective or positively wrong.

German.

Hossfeld's German Grammar. By C. Brenkmann. (Hirschfeld Brothers.)

THE present new edition by Mr. L. A. Happé should win a much increased circulation for this valuable book. The full English-German vocabulary greatly adds to its usefulness, and the carefully-graduated lessons are admirably fitted to give learners a sound knowledge of German. The special feature of the method is to give each day exercise in grammar, reading, translation and re-translation. Both exercises in composition and reading extracts are well chosen, and the short poetical anthology adds grace to the book. The rules are full and clear, and the verb especially is adequately treated.

Goethe's Hermann and Dorothea. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by James Taft Hatfield. (The Macmillan Co., New York.)

PROF. HATFIELD'S introduction is a sound piece of work, giving us abundant learning and careful criticism; the notes are full and to the point, but not too numerous; and the text, constituted by the light of the latest and best authorities, leaves little to be desired.

Biology and Geology.

Kirke's Handbook of Physiology. (Fifteenth Edition.) By W. D. Halliburton. (John Murray.)

THIS new edition of Kirke's Physiology will be welcomed by every teacher of the subject. Here, at all events, is a case often "survival of the fittest" among books. An exhaustive treatise of nearly a thousand pages for which a steady demand exists must be admirably adapted to the requirements of serious students of the functions of the various mammalian organs. Prof. Halliburton has included an account of all the more important pieces of physiological research which have been published since the appearance of the last edition. Though the chief theme of the book is human physiology, a glance through it is sufficient to demonstrate the interdependence of all branches of scientific study. Human physiology—nor, indeed, physiology in its broadest sense, whether dealing with animals or plants—is not an isolated subject, but must rather be regarded as the application of the laws of chemistry and physics to the study of life in its multitudinous forms, a truth which these clearly written pages amply testify. Indeed, the reader of this volume must have a very considerable knowledge of both chemistry and physics in order to follow intelligently and understand many of the methods and results described.

Insects: Their Structure and Life. By George H. Carpenter. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

MR. CARPENTER'S book is intended to provide a general outline of the whole subject of entomology. The book is avowedly a compilation, but it should prove useful, since there is here brought together, in a convenient compass, the leading facts and generalisations necessary for an intelligent survey of a very extensive field of study. After a short account of insect anatomy, and an interesting survey of the endless variety that can be traced in the methods of growth of insects from the egg to the perfect form, the complicated question of classification is dealt with. The surroundings and pedigree of insects provide material for the last two of the six chapters into which the book is divided. The volume is attractively illustrated and well printed, and should grow in favour with the increasing number of amateur students of what Mr. Carpenter aptly describes as "a delightful chapter in the great book of Nature."

An Introduction to the Study of Zoology. By B. Lindsay. (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.)

MISS LINDSAY writes in a pleasing way, and her book, which has now reached a second edition, provides a satisfactory introduction to the serious study of zoology. There is none of that talking down to the reader which is naturally so much objected to by the artisan who has interests outside his halfpenny newspaper and the doings of his trade society. The reader who studies these chapters, and follows Miss Lindsay's judicious instructions in the matter of practical work, will be in a position to tackle the larger and more serious treatises to which he is directed in a well-arranged bibliography of zoological literature with which the book provides him. We are particularly pleased with the concluding chapter on "Animals as Fellow-creatures," which should go a long way towards developing "a clear and sympathetic understanding of the manifold varying forms under which we recognise the mysterious unity called Life."

A Text-book of Plant Diseases. By George Massee. (Duckworth & Co.)

THE day is fortunately past when blights and other plant diseases were regarded as dispensations of a mysterious Providence, not to be understood by simple mortals, but resignedly endured. The spread of the spirit of inquiry, the desire to discover the why and wherefore of everything, is gradually, though surely, eliminating that fatalistic acquiescence on the part of the horticulturalist in the destruction, by parasitic attacks, of valuable crops. More than this, the by no means ancient worship of rule-of-thumb methods is being displaced by the careful and laborious study of the broad principles regulating the mode of life of those groups of parasites which prove so injurious to cultivated plants. The number of practical agriculturalists who are intelligently studying the question of plant diseases steadily increases, and this well-arranged book of reference will supply them with scientific methods of attack which will prove an incalculable advantage. We are glad to notice that the author insists upon the necessity of a preliminary knowledge of the normal mode of plant life, which constitutes the subject of vegetable physiology, if full benefit is to be derived from his more technical volume. It cannot be too often pointed out that every department of technology must ultimately rest upon the findings of pure science.

An Intermediate Text-book of Geology. By Charles Lapworth. (William Blackwood & Sons.)

THE late Prof. Page's Introductory Text-book of Geology, with which every student of geology is familiar, has undergone a complete metamorphosis at the hands of Prof. Lapworth. The book has been entirely re-written, and some hundred pages have been added. When it is remembered that the first edition of the original work was published in 1854, and that this year is the centenary of the recognition of geology as a more or less exact science, it will be seen that extensive changes were necessary to bring the book up to date. These have been gradually introduced in the twelve previous editions, but the thirteenth issue only resembles the earlier ones in the general sequence of the subjects dealt with. Though the volume still meets the requirements of beginners, yet the student who has assimilated all the information which it contains will have a very fair knowledge of the guiding principles of the science. The maps which have been added to this edition, though small and somewhat crowded, will be of service in leading the reader to what must always be the most valuable part of geological study, namely fieldwork. Several new illustrations have been added, and the summaries at the ends of the chapters have been recast. In its revised form the volume provides teachers and students with a trustworthy and interesting account of the chief points of a fascinating subject.

Metallurgy and Chemistry.

Handbook of Metallurgy. By Carl Schnabel. Translated by Henry Louis. 2 vols. (Macmillan.)

THERE is no doubt that Prof. Louis has done a piece of valuable work in presenting British metallurgists with a translation of the valuable hand-book of Dr. Schnabel, of the Clausthal School of Mines. The original German text affords abundant evidence of its author's fitness for the task he set himself. Not only have we the results of Dr. Schnabel's own unique experience of metallurgical processes, but in the volumes are also to be found the chief results at which such well-known authorities as Egleston, Peters, and Hofman in America have arrived, and also brief notices, by the translator, of the methods of extraction of different metals which have been perfected since the German edition appeared in 1894. The first part, which consists of 876 pages, deals with the metallurgy of copper, lead, silver, and gold, while the second volume (of 664 pages) is concerned with the extraction of zinc, cadmium, mercury, bismuth, tin, antimony, arsenic, nickel, cobalt, platinum, and aluminium from their respective ores. The handbook should find a prominent place in every technical college library where metallurgy is studied, and should also be added to the public libraries of towns where metallurgical processes are carried on.

A Course of Practical Chemistry. Part II., Intermediate. By M. M. Pattison-Muir, M.A. (Longmans.)

THE second part of Mr. Pattison-Muir's Course of Practical Chemistry is a book of 234 pages, with only twenty-one illustrations, and some of these not very good. The course began in the first part published previously is here carried some steps farther, the student being introduced to volumetric analysis; the preparation of certain oxides, a few salts, and a series of compounds of chromium; the examination of complex mixtures qualitatively; and the gravimetric estimation of a few typical elements. Though the selection of subjects dealt with leaves much to be desired, the student who has carefully worked through this volume and its predecessor should have a fair knowledge of qualitative and quantitative analysis.

Progressive Lessons in Science. By A. Abbott and Arthur Key. (Blackie & Son.)

THE Progressive Lessons in Science is really two books bound together in one volume. The first part, by Mr. Abbott, is a well-arranged series of experiments in chemistry for elementary students, and calls for no particular remark, except that many similar books are already in existence. The second part is of a much more original character. Mr. Key starts by informing the reader of the quantitative composition of blood, and then proceeds, in a series of experimental lessons, to trace the various constituents in the blood in foods of various kinds, and to ultimately trace them back to the soil. The plan is ingenious, and at first sight appears educative, but we are extremely sceptical of a youngster's ability to follow the intricate argument involved.

Mathematics.

An Introduction to the Mathematical Theory of Attraction. By Francis A. Tarleton. (Longmans.)

THE theory of attraction is very rightly described by Prof. Tarleton as "the portal to most of the higher departments of mathematical physics," and it was a good idea to bring together in one book a satisfactory treatment of this important branch of mathematics. Hitherto the student has had to consult several volumes to find an adequate treatment of the subjects here dealt with. In the future much valuable time and effort will be saved. Everything possible seems to have been done to make the work of the student as easy as possible, and teachers will look forward to the publication of the sequel which Prof. Tarleton promises.

Elementary Trigonometry. Part I. By A. J. Pressland and Charles Tweedie. (Oliver & Boyd.)

THOUGH styled an "elementary" trigonometry the book of Messrs. Pressland and Tweedie is not exactly one to place in the hands of a boy beginning the study of this interesting section of mathematics. At the same time, in the upper mathematical forms of our larger schools, where the elements of trigonometry have been already mastered, the book could be read with great advantage. The prominence given to graphical illustration, and the large use made of the method of projection, would present, in a new and suggestive light, truths of which some knowledge has been previously gained.

Practical Plane and Solid Geometry. By James Riddell. (Oliver & Boyd.)

MR. RIDDEL deals with descriptive geometry as far as it is included in the elementary stage of the practical plane and solid geometry syllabus of the Department of Science and Art. Though there is no lack of illustrations, many of them are too small to be immediately clear to a beginner, and some pages are so closely printed that they are sure to appear unattractive to boys, who abhor books which, by reason of their long paragraphs, look "dry." At the same time, the student who is uninfluenced by such considerations will find an ample exposition of an important subject.

Miscellaneous.

A Manual of Psychology. Vol. II. By G. F. Stout. (W. B. Clive.)

THE absence of vague generalisations, which distinguished the first volume of Dr. Stout's manual of psychology, is also a marked characteristic of the second part, which can now be obtained separately. The lucidity of the argument and the profusion of illustrative examples is maintained, and the undergraduate who proposes to offer psychology as a subject in his final examination cannot do better than prepare himself under Dr. Stout's guidance. This second volume is concerned with perception, as well as with ideational and conceptual processes. The dissertation on the emotions and the treatment of spatial and temporal perceptions includes everything necessary for a first study of these sections of one of the youngest of the sciences.

The Elements of Sociology. By Franklin H. Giddings. (The Macmillan Co.)

PROF. GIDDINGS is already known in this country as a writer on sociological problems. His larger book on The Principles of Sociology has already been translated into French, Russian, and Spanish; and another volume on the Theory of Socialisation has been translated into Italian. A new volume by an authority who exerts so wide an influence is sure of a careful and sympathetic examination. It is only in recent years that it has come to be recognised that the aggregation of men into societies is governed by certain laws which become every year better defined and more thoroughly understood. There is, moreover, a growing tendency to attach a proper importance, in schemes of education, to a training in the duties of citizenship; and those teachers who recognise the necessity for some attempt to so instruct their pupils that they may take an intelligent part in the work of the community to which they belong will be well advised in acquainting themselves with what Prof. Giddings thinks should properly be included in a school course for boys and girls during their last terms at school.

Prize-Day Platitudes.

To the radically minded educationist the annual prize distribution in our public schools is one of the saddest of educational functions. Many of those who listened to the popular platitudes of the prize distributions at the end of last term, and, while they listened called to mind the voice of Reform now crying in the educational wilderness, must have been deeply depressed by a sense of the wrong-headedness of the whole proceeding of prize-giving as it is—the false ideals held out to adolescent youth and the false rewards recommended to their imagination as an equivalent for misspent energy. Not that any blame attaches to the pupils, who act and believe as they are taught to act and believe, or the distinguished ladies and gentlemen who preside at these functions and do their level best to shake the false beliefs out of the minds of the prize-winners and replace them by nobler ideals and aspirations of a purer nature than those by virtue of which the prizes are won. The blame lies at the door of corrupt traditions and an unscientific system, which attaches infinitely more importance and value to the instruments of education than to its ultimate object and purpose. The truth of this indictment—by no means a new one—is thrown into relief by three assertions made by speakers at the recent prize-givings. The Rev. George Richardson, on retiring from the position of second master at Winchester College, ventured the prediction “that in fifty years’ time even some of the great public schools will be mixed schools for boys and girls.” Lord Rosebery, speaking at Epsom College, said “the first and primary object of every school was to turn out men . . . If a school succeeded in that, then he, for one, put all the studies of science, classics, and mathematics in the second position.” Prof. Jebb, speaking at St. Olave’s Grammar School, Southwark, said: “If the best educational use was to be made of school time, a boy must have his intelligence and imagination trained by literary study . . . using the word literature in the largest sense, to include the best British books and the history of our own country. He strongly advocated the teaching of poetry in schools.” These three remarks at once touch three characteristic weak spots in our educational system, and point to three great aspirations of the new education. From a false notion of manliness, coupled with an equally false notion of womanliness, we deprive both boys and girls of the benefits to be derived by contact of the distinctive virtues of manhood and womanhood. In a blind race after scholarship so called, we neglect the culture of true wisdom and forget that the function of the public school is, not to turn out a few intellectual prodigies, but to make every single boy or girl it contains a wise, capable, and worthy man or woman. Lastly, deluded by the will-o’-the-wisps of science, commercialism, and similar partial developments of the child’s mind, we forget utterly to give prizes for that all-round culture which can only be produced by the study of literature in the wide definition given by Prof. Jebb—prizes for manliness, gentleness, unselfishness, patience, courage, common sense, handiness—in a word, for real wisdom and worth.—The Educational Review.

“LIGHT FROM THE EAST,”

OR, THE WITNESS OF THE MONUMENTS.

By Rev. C. J. BALL, M.A.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF BIBLICAL ARCHAEOLOGY.
CONTAINS OVER 330 ILLUSTRATIONS (30 PLATES COLOURED).

Professor SAYCE, LL.D., writes:—

“A museum in petto.”
Pall Mall Gazette.
“As complete a collection as could have been got together.”
Athenaeum.
“Full of curious and interesting information.”—Guardian.

“This sumptuous volume ought to find an honoured place on the table of every student of the Bible.”

"David Harum."

An Enquiry.

THE name of Noyes Westcott bears no significance in England. Even the careful student of literary organs, the man who can follow intelligently the allusiveness of our most encyclopædic chroniqueurs, would scarcely recognise it. But in America this banker who began to write at the age of fifty and finished his first book on his death-bed, is universally famous as the author of a novel whose success is likely to eclipse even that of Trilby. Some two hundred and fifty thousand copies of David Harum have been sold within a year. Among ourselves such a record would be impossible for any work appealing, as David Harum certainly does, to what it is convenient to term the educated classes, the classes which support the best magazines. In the United States, that riesenheim, though all things are possible there, a like phenomenon cannot occur more than a few times in a century. To give a just idea of its singularity is difficult, for the meaning of figures may not be conveyed by words. In literature the phrase "a quarter of a million" is a phrase merely, as a "billion" is a phrase in geology. To grasp it, comparisons must be used. Let us observe that as many copies of David Harum are bought in a couple of months as of, say, The Jungle Book in five years.

If David Harum contains any surprise, it is, not that the public should be so easily pleased, but that an amateur of letters should have been able to produce such good work, and that such good work should be so widely appreciated. Noyes Westcott may have been an everyday person, which is to say, a non-spiritual person, seeing what he saw with everyday eyes; he may have been heedless of the subtler manifestations of beauty; he may not have discovered with de Maupassant that words have souls, or with Flaubert that sentiment is the devil. David Harum remains—David Harum will probably remain for some years—a convincing and delightful creation, and, in the sense that it sticks in the memory, a memorable one.

Though he is a mere beholder of such direct action as the novel contains, David actually constitutes the whole book. He is the book. Without him there is nothing, unless it be his sister and housekeeper, old Mrs. Bixbee, who is really part and parcel of him—his necessary complement. I have called him a creation. The charm of the character-drawing in a work of fiction may lie in the manner of revealing a familiar type, or it may lie in the native originality and attractiveness of the character presented. In the first case the reader's pleasure is æsthetic; in the second it is partly æsthetic and partly "of the human heart," in varying proportions. In the first case the author's achievement is chiefly a portrait; in the second it is chiefly a creation, though here also (some authors are lucky) it may be chiefly a portrait. Whether Noyes Westcott found David Harum or created him I do not know. Nor is the fact so important as it may seem, since fiction is more properly concerned with presentation than with the creation of unusual types (else were Dickens the greatest of all novelists). The important fact is, that David Harum, the character presented, has, apart from any art or skill of presenting, an extraordinary fascination and delectability, and that the success of the book is less literary than something else—call it a success of humanity.

David Harum, the rustic banker of Homeville, in New York State, has many qualities. As a banker, of course, he is gifted with shrewdness; but his genius for mercantile transactions, surpassing that of a banker, rises to that of a horse-dealer. Banking was his vocation, horse-dealing his recreation—a recreation at once exciting and profitable. Horse-dealing gave scope for those other gifts of wit, humour, and retort, which he possessed to such a remarkable degree. In effective retort he never failed. When taxed with attempting to buy a horse on the Sabbath, he replied: "The better the day the better the deal." That was a fair sample of his deadly impromptus. Really literate, he delighted, as many literate people do, to use the most outrageous dialect, the most monstrous slang. If a young lady pleases him, he expresses his appreciation thus: "That girl o' your'n, if you don't mind my sayin' it, comes as near bein' a full team an' a cross dog under the wagin as you c'n git." Nearly the whole of his talk is stable slang of an inspired kind; and the invariable humour of his reminiscences often serves to disguise, or to distract attention from, his superbly dishonest attitude in a horse-bargain. Within the bank his uprightness was unquestioned. On the road or in the stable-yard he abandoned all codes save his own, for he regarded horse-dealing as an affair set apart—the one unique thing lying outside the scope of the Commandments.

A hoss-trade ain't like anythin' else. A feller may be straighter 'n a string in ev'rythin' else, an' never tell the truth—that is, the hull truth—about a hoss. I trade hosses with hoss-traders. They all think they know as much as I do, an' I dunno but what they do. They hain't learnt no different anyway, an' they've had chances enough. If a feller come to me that didn't think he knowed anythin' about a hoss, an' wanted to buy on the square, he'd git, fur's I knew, square treatment. At any rate, I'd tell him all 't I knew. But when one o' them smart Alecks comes along and cal'lates to do up old Dave, why he's got to take his chances, that's all.

David Harum, however, is not, as many paragraphers have loosely stated, a mere collection of horse-stories. A few are told at the beginning of the book, but they cease at page 21, and then there is no semblance of a horse-story till page 228. The middle and larger part of the book, since there is very little direct action except at the beginning and the end, consists of David's gossip about the past—talk so miscellaneous as to indicate plainly that the author was several times at a loss how to impel forward a plot which obstinately refused to make progress of its own accord. Much of this reminiscence is, in essence, extremely sentimental. Indeed, after its humour and half-cynic wit, the book is most remarkable for its sentimentality. Sixty pages are given to the recital of a Christmas Day saturated with "seasonableness"; of these sixty, twenty describe the dinner. And the episode of David's magnificent requital to the widow of the man who had taken him, as a tattered starving boy, to the local circus and filled him up with gingerbread, is a vast orgy of sentiment—delicately served, be it said. This episode, quite the best-imagined thing in the novel, must have had much to do with its popularity.

When we leave David Harum, who is the spectator of the story, and come to the story itself, we find that Noyes Westcott has merely imitated, but imitated very well, the latest fashion in novels of American society. There are a dozen regular contributors to Harper's, the Century, and the Ladies' Home Journal capable of recording the courtship of John Lenox precisely as Westcott has recorded it. No doubt this fact has steadied the book, adding respectability to its credentials, and preserving it from the risks incident to entire newness. Howells, Davis, and Sara Jeannette Duncan: mix them, and you will obtain at once that atmosphere of luxury, correctness, cosmopolitanism, badiane, and nicely tempered passion which is served out by the great publishing firms at the beginning of every month. They are marvellously alike, these unexceptionable tales: Fifth Avenue, Italy, saloon deck of the Oceanic—and the special atmosphere: there you have it. As in a thousand others, so in David Harum.

In England David Harum has aroused very little attention. Novels which excite America seldom or never meet with anything but indifference here. The reason usually is, either that they are imitations (a little weak, but wholly unashamed) of styles distinctively English (this applies especially to historical novels), or that they are quite beneath our standard, American taste being as yet behind our own. But neither of these charges can be enforced against David Harum. It owes nothing to English models; and it is at once capable and modest, certainly superior to several conspicuous English successes of recent months. Why, then, should it not have succeeded here as in America? The answer is not forthcoming. The main causes operating against success were, perhaps, extremely subtle in character, scarcely to be seized. Without doubt the "society" part of the book, while helping it in America, would hinder it in England, but not, I think, seriously. The explanation lies elsewhere. Of one thing I am convinced, that David Harum himself would have enchanted these isles if he had been properly introduced to them. Had Noyes Westcott been fortunately "discovered" in the right quarters, had his book been nicely heralded, had it been backed by a sufficient moral force, had fifty little things happened—then the fame of David Harum might have filled the country.

Reflections of a Drunkard on the Banks of the Rhine.

(From the French.)

How glorious is this Universe—
But why, O Lord, amidst the scene
So much plain water intersperse?
More pleased by far would I have been,
If 'stead of water's vapid sheen
Rolled wine in generous floods of red
Along the ancient river's bed.
Yet not to make an element
Of Wine perhaps was kindly meant—
In this the Lord has prudence shown,
I would have drunk the World alone.

Essays in Enthusiastic Journalism.

III.—"Phyllida; or, The Milkmaid."

As Le Petit Journal des Refusées was a reaction from the Lark, in the direction of unbridled nonsense and unconventionality, so Phyllida was an effort to give scope to literary ideas of the more critical sort, which were too formal to be tolerated in our monthly. The Lark eschewed criticism of any sort, and ignored the mention of current literature. The purely literary topic had no place in its pages, and the "local colour" of San Francisco received scant notice. To have our say, then, as others used: to build from the nucleus of les jeunes a literary coterie in California, that had recidivated from its former distinction as the birthplace of so many successes in letters, Phyllida; or, The Milkmaid was founded.

It seemed to us that it was possible to obtain a popular favour for a small folio, semi-monthly sheet, which should contain lithe and sinewy comment, gossipy chatter, causerie, and reviews, "devoted to literary topics, and reflections upon the doings of the town." Had it indeed been all that, it might have succeeded, but we were not content to be formal; we cared at heart nothing for criticism, and less for the topics of the town! We had but little to say, yet it was our dream to revive the art of the pleasant, personal "short essay" of Addison and Steele. We fell into the fault, too, of exploiting California's claims to greatness, of which the world has had overmuch promise, and we damned the enterprise at the outset by a league with the recognised orthodox littérateurs, who had no sympathy with our aims, and who surfeited us with dull and sleepy monologues of the Chair.

Nor was this the whole of our indiscretion, for it was our wild whim to enlist Society patronage, and make Phyllida a test of culture on the coast: a paper that should be "taken up" by the mondaines, and become the talk of fashionable dinner-parties. Not that we were bitten with social ambitions, ourselves—I cry you mercy—but such a start might well have sent our Phyllida sailing into prominence off-hand. And so we must needs be off with our own rattle-pate manners and methods, and begin proselytising for aristocratic contributors. The practice is not unknown in London, I believe, but it was comparatively new in the United States.

My three interviews with young ladies of boasted cleverness in a certain class of what is known in San Francisco as "Society" were amusing, though of little profit to the proposed bi-weekly. They appeared to be flattered by the invitation, and it seemed that they were not without literary aspirations (in America it is common to term a person "literary" if he reads books), but at the prospect of seeing their reviews printed they were not unpleasantly nervous. To obtain the privilege of signed communications, then, was absolutely impossible. They were afraid of ridicule, and deprecated their abilities. We did not insist too much upon quality of style, but it was useless to print anonymous commonplaces, and this feature of the scheme fell through, except for a review signed "Celestine X.," about which the less said the better, for the secret of its authorship shall never be disclosed.

However Phyllida's matter fell short of our anticipations, her manner and dress were above reproach. We made up the sheet (it was a four-page paper, eight inches wide by eleven inches high) in the manner of the old Tatler, printed in the typographical style of 1702, with the old fashion of spelling, the italics, the "small caps," the long "s," all complete. We ran catchwords in at the turn of the leaf, we designed antique initial letters, we made free use of quotation marks—in short, it was a revival in every way consistent, except for the dreariness of the text. Our types were especially cast for us from matrices one hundred and fifty years old, from Caslon's old Philadelphia faces, and the whole was printed on a smoke-coloured imitation hand-made paper, beautiful to look upon.

For the reason of the title, I can do no better than quote the first article that appeared—to wit:

"Dedicated to PHYLLIDA, gentle Patroness of this Sheet—who, in the Guise of Rustick Milkmaid, shall look into these Pages, to find the Fruit of my Promise, & the Justification of my Boast:"

"When you flouted me, my dear PHYLLIDA, upon my vaunts of the Taste and Culture of this Place, & of that Candle, hid in a Bushell, in such sore Need of Snauffering—my Heart was heavier than my Replis. I put on a bold enough Front, but I fear my Bragging was but a vain Thing in your Ears. But when you offer'd to put my Claims to the Proof, your Taunts inspir'd me, where your Indifference fail'd, & so I challenge your Purse, as you have dar'd my Wit. Indeed, you have the lighter Burden to bear in our Enterprise, PHYLLIDA, for the Bills you shall have to pay, will be neither so many, nor so important as the Persons it is my Part to meet, that the name of CALIFORNIA may not be forever a By-Word & a Hissing.—And while I shall have the Town by the Ears, if I fail, you shall rest Undiscover'd, & safe to twit me with my Disrepute. Yet if I shou'd prove my Point, I may not do the Same by you, who shall then be magnify'd into a Patroness of the Arts! . . . . ."

This was a brave enough beginning, and, had we secured our patroness Phyllida, we might have gone on with the venture. We had, indeed, hoped to secure a supporter in this way—some wealthy dilettante with a local pride, who should find it worth her while to see us through in the experiment. As it was, no one betrayed the slightest curiosity as to Phyllida's personality, and after two numbers, the second far duller than the first (and with all the charming anachronisms of typography Bowdlerised, that our critics might read the more readily our inanities), Phyllida committed suicide, with no farewell, and few regrets.

We had a boy of fourteen in the office to set up the paper, and pull proofs, and I doubt if the training we gave him in obsolete typography will ever profit him. We had rules for the use of the apostrophe in past participles, the initialing of substantives, the italicising of important adjectives, and the spacing out of proper names. I doubt if he ever learned them, however, by the look of a corrected proof in my scrap-book—all that was ever done on Number Three.

We were badly prepared, both in money and in brains, for the effort to revive California's literary renown, or to create a "centre." Before I left the town we destroyed several thousands of copies, so that now a Phyllida is worth more than she was in the blush of her youth—but for reasons quite different than we had hoped. But, mortifying as was our failure, we had, at least, achieved two numbers of a paper whose title did not begin with "The." But the day for the renaissance of the light essay has not yet come in California.

GELETT BURGESS.

Things Seen.

The Pink Man.

WHAT is it, I wonder, that makes me just now so suddenly and so clearly recall the pink man? He kept a shop, or rather a stall, in Florence, in the Via Maggio, and, thirteen years ago, two of us used to buy fruit of him. It was a little sloping cavern of a shop, open in front like a child's toy, and the rosy, apron-girded man used to stand in the doorway, looking like the freshly painted wooden proprietor. It was Adela who named him "the pink man," and no one now remembers him by that title except me. I think the pink man would have been a little hurt if we had passed homeward three days running without pausing to make a purchase. Is he living somewhere still, I wonder, a stout and elderly Italian, and has he kept any remembrance of the two foreigners who, for three months, thirteen years ago, used to pass and repass his shop daily? He cannot remember, for he never knew—our Italian being unequal to the explanation—how cruel a disappointment he sold to us in those white, dried figs. The point was that our English palates detested the flavour of aniseed, which in those days pervaded the whole Florentine cuisine. Biscuits, unless bearing the stamp of Huntley & Palmer, preserves of every kind, and all cakes of unfamiliar aspect, had gradually been abjured. Fruit, however, we had not learned to distrust; and we bought cheerfully from the stock of the pink man a dozen or so of small, pale, flattened figs. But as we ate them beside our crackling wood fire we stared at each other "with a wild surmise, silent." Could it be, or was imagination playing tricks upon us? Were we verily haunted by the phantom of aniseed? Narrower inspection revealed that the figs had each been split open, one, two, three, four aniseeds pressed into the soft interior, and the split halves neatly closed again. Of course we extracted the remaining aniseeds, but the offending flavour lingered, and dried figs, too, had to vanish from our menu.

My little Veronica, you whose eleven years begin to bring an interest in the wider world; you whose dream it is to see Italy, one day, perhaps, your young feet will pass, beside my aging ones, between the tall houses of the Via Maggio; I shall show you the low shop, and say: "There the pink man used to be—it was a fruit-shop then." Or, perhaps, the shop will be gone. I shall look uncertainly at the new, white Parisian houses, and say: "It must have been about here." We shall seek elsewhere for dried figs with aniseeds in them; and Veronica's smiling youth will receive a little impression, and hold a little memory, fainter than ours.

Florence is changing, they tell me; the old market square with the gay display of straw hats and coloured handkerchiefs is gone; and Veronica's memory will hold no picture of that cook-shop, facing the fountain and the metal boar, where we used to see chickens revolving visibly on triangular spits, and brass dishes shining brightly from a dark background. For Veronica, perhaps, there will some day be a Florence haunted by my ghost, as for me there is a Florence haunted by Adela's. For me her figure walks rather in the Via Maggio, where it dwelt for three months, than in London where she dwelt so long. You, my little Veronica, when we go together to Florence, will see before you your future—as we saw ours then; but I shall see my past, and Adela, and the old fruit-shop and the phantom of the pink man.

A Chance Meal.

THEY waved me upstairs and into the coffee-room. There I found Gladys at lunch with her governess, in the act of being denied another piece of honeycomb. The room had a bay window, like a great mild eye overlooking the sun-steeped village, and as I gazed, drumming upon the sash, suddenly round the corner came—what do you think?—a bear, a great, brown, slouching, dusty bear. Save for that bear and his keeper, who wore a blue blouse and carried a cornet, the village was deserted, empty as a gleaned field. When they reached the strip of green in front of the inn window, the keeper sounded the cornet. Thereupon the bear rose upon his hind legs and bowed to the village. "Dance! Shoulder arms! Turn summersault like drunken man! Kiss me!"—ponderously the poor beast puzzled through his tricks, when Gladys suddenly clapped her hands; her blue eyes danced:

"O la pauvre bête! Laisse-moi lui donner quelque chose pour son diner. Ah! Là! Là! Du miel! Les ours aiment le miel. Je te prie, chère Mademoiselle. Je te prie?" With that she placed what remained of the honeycomb on a piece of paper, and, beckoning to the keeper, cried: "C'est pour votre ours, Monsieur!" The honeycomb was prize honeycomb, the pick of a flower show; the bear was old and grey, a veteran in plain living. And here suddenly on a hot, stupid day, just like a thousand other hot, stupid days, a piece of exquisite honeycomb, big as one of his knees, falls from the clouds, and he is hidden eat.

Well, the old fellow ate—leisurely, lovingly, from his master's hand—and when he had finished the keeper threw away the paper and called for beer—for himself. While his face was buried in the mug, a bee, then two, then three, then a company began to gather about the piece of paper smeared with the remains of the honeycomb. And the bear saw them, saw their intention through and through. He pulled at his chain, but the keeper held him fast. The bees circled nearer to the paper. One of them had even settled upon it, when the bear's paw issued slowly along the dusty ground. It reached the paper. In another moment paper, smear of honey, bee were all in the bear's mouth. He looked up at me.

I still maintain he winked.

Ibsen: Beau and Genius.

THAT very bright American magazine, The Book Buyer, prints this month a character-sketch of Henrik Ibsen, which has special interest on the eve of the production of his new play. The author, Mr. Perriton Maxwell, has looked at the dramatist through keen irreverent eyes, and this is how he sees him:

"He is the most interesting personage in the Norwegian capital—and Ibsen before anyone is conscious of that fact. Down the Karl Johann's Gade to the Grand Hotel he walks every day, rain or shine; when the weather is particularly inviting he pays two daily visits to the hotel. On such days he appears punctually at one in the afternoon and again at eight in the evening. Ibsen is above all things a methodical man. His life is ruled by the clock. He has his own table in the gallery overlooking the garden, and the minute he arrives a mute but well-trained waiter places before the shaggy philosopher a bottle of brandy and another of soda. This is the author's favourite stimulant, and two glasses of the liquor his limit at a sitting. With the care of a druggist compounding a prescription he measures and mixes his drink, which he sips, a swallow at a time, with such perfect regularity, that one can tell off by his action the lapse of each five minutes with no recourse to a timepiece. These daily libations seem to be the one consolation that life affords to Henrik Ibsen, whose ingrained melancholy impresses itself on all who get near enough to him to converse informally.

Recently it was borne in upon this observing old man that those who haunted the public café of the Grand Hotel were, in the main, his own fellow-countrymen, and that if he was to be seen by travelling Englishmen, Americans, Frenchmen, Germans, and Italians, it would be necessary to take up his post in the hotel proper. Accordingly, he chose for himself a table in a conspicuous part of the gallery, which overlooks the big garden, where all foreigners take their dinners, and thus it was possible to be 'the observed of all observers,' with no fear of being approached or inveigled into conversation.

Having taken his seat, the dean of modern Norse literature arranges his newspapers, his hat, his spectacles, with all the fussiness of a stage spinster. Six pairs of eye-glasses are laid out in a row on the table. For every paragraph he reads he places a fresh pair of glasses on his nose, always pausing to polish them and hold them to the light. As he reads his newspaper, apparently absorbed in its contents, a close observer will detect the old man's eyes roving from the printed page in the direction of the people who are looking his way. He is a sly old rascal, this Ibsen. If ladies are among those who are watching him, the ruddy face is at once lit up with the radiance of self-satisfaction. It is an ill day for Ibsen and the Grand Hotel when foreigners are few in the garden. But Ibsen is rarely without an audience, and the more this audience stares and flutters the more luminous becomes the old man's countenance.

Dr. Ibsen's life has been unhappy since earliest childhood, and although success has come to him abundantly in his later days, it has come too late. He no longer has the capacity for enjoying the fame and wealth that are his. He must needs fall back upon himself for the greatest gratification of his personal desires. His whims and fads circle wholly around himself, and the circle is a narrow one. As a lad in the unattractive town of Skien—his native place—Ibsen's life was sunless and poverty-pinched. Till he was past middle age he gained neither countenance nor encouragement in his own land; indeed, he was deemed a man of no ability at all. His work was derided, and over each new day hung the pall of bitterest adversity. . . . In the face of his cloudy past it is not, therefore, surprising that Henrik Ibsen is misanthropic and shrouded in his own conceit. With so little that is genuinely joyous in his life, there is nothing left but the creature comforts and the superficial adulation of a few sight-seeing foreigners. Fame—even in literature—is surely not founded on the hasty scrutiny of one's person by a handful of Cook's tourists; but this sort of thing brings complacency to the mind of Henrik Ibsen.

Knowing that the moment he leaves his house in Christiania he will become the centre of interest along the streets, he is always careful to dress for the occasion. It would add another wrinkle to his brow to discover a button missing from his coat or a blur on the beaver of his tall silk hat. He is the Brummel of Norse letters. His clothes are made of broadcloth of fine texture; his tailor is the best in Christiania. He always wears a 'tile' of metallic smoothness. His boots are of patent leather. Toilet articles he carries about with him always and everywhere, and frequently he brings them into requisition in the most public places. While on exhibition in the hotel garden in full view of a cosmopolitan throng it is no uncommon act for him to take from his pocket a comb or brush and caressingly stroke his famous white whiskers, or lift to a greater height his equally famous white pompadour locks, standing straight up in the air like a miniature Mont Blanc. He has a trick of brushing his hat with the sleeve of his coat. Now and then he pauses, looking long and earnestly into the opening of his head-piece. He presents at such times the picture of a leonine sage of the Sagas deep in the maze of some vast problem of the cosmos. It is all a mistake; it is Ibsen critically viewing Ibsen. There is a mirror fastened in the bottom of his hat, and he is looking after the twist of his cravat.

But when Ibsen, the author, has formulated the scheme for a new drama, and determines to weld and mould it into form, then occurs his metamorphosis from fop to workman—a workman oblivious of the whole wide world, its peoples, and its passions. The butterfly goes back to the chrysalis; the feasting crowds at the Grand Hotel can no longer feast their eyes on Henrik Ibsen, nor watch him stroke his whiskers and sip brandy and soda at five minutes' intervals. . . . He eats, sleeps, lives alone. . . . Thus lives the real Henrik Ibsen, a two-sided man of letters, one all frills and foppery, vain, supercilious, childish; the other the thinker, the worker, a genius."

Memoirs of the Moment.

MR. STANHOPE FORBES, A.R.A., with the aid of Mrs. Stanhope Forbes, has decided to open, in the Meadows Studios, Newlyn, a series of classes for serious students of art, whether men or women. The announcement will be received with great satisfaction by a large number of persons, if only because what may be called the master-and-disciple system of teaching has been so little practised in England. It is, perhaps, a symptom of English unsociability that the studios of eminent painters have hardly ever been open during working hours to the learner. It can hardly be that Sir John Millais, for instance, had methods so high, secrets so sacred, that he could not communicate, in his own measure, to the young what Rubens, in his, communicated to Vandyck, or Carolus Duran, in his, to Sargent. The other alternative, that the British "master" gave nothing to a disciple because he had nothing to give, is one which need not now be discussed. Prof. Herkomer's efforts at Bushey have been sufficiently successful to encourage a brother painter like Mr. Stanhope Forbes to do what he has done, and to do it at Newlyn, with a thousand advantages of locality. Newlyn, indeed, has given its name to a School of Painting in another sense—it has been the home of a group of artists, including Mr. Forbes himself, and his fellow Associate, Mr. Bramley, whose work has been, in its own class, the very salt of the Academy exhibitions for this last dozen of years. The leader of the Newlyn School is a teacher, a communicator, by temperament, mixing his brains with his paints, and putting, according to the phrase, his heart into his work. The first term of the new academy on the Cornish coast will open on October 16, and the course will consist mainly of drawing and painting from the life.

"MR. GLADSTONE'S FAITH" is the heading of a letter that one daily paper after another has obligingly put into print. It is signed, "The Translator of Christianity and Agnosticism," and it says that Mr. Gladstone, who wrote a letter of approval to the Abbé Picard, the author of the original book, has, on that account, been accused—by what absurd person it does not appear—of "secret Romanism." This, the English translator assures us, even at this date, is untrue. "I am tired," he says, "of apologising for Mr. Gladstone. I regret that it should be so, but the fact remains that Mr. Gladstone was perfectly well satisfied with the Anglican Church." All this sounds very flat; but a little vivacity may be given to it by the fact that the writer who thus signs himself "The Translator of Christianity and Agnosticism" is—Lord Llandaff, formerly Mr. Henry Mathews, Q.C., and Home Secretary. These apologies for the religion of Mr. Gladstone, which "tire" even the old political antagonist of his who now makes them, and certainly weary everyone else, have, however, a certain method in their seeming superfluity. "The book," adds the Translator, "which has caused so much excitement can be seen at most of the public libraries or obtained from the publishers (Sands & Co.)." The zeal of Lord Llandaff, himself a Roman Catholic, for the reputation of Mr. Gladstone as a consistent Anglican has been spurred, it seems, into activity by the advisability of an advertisement for the "exciting" translation. You never really know the resources of a Cabinet Minister—until he publishes a book.

THE death of Viscount Clifden, who was also Lord Dover, recalls a series of suits particularly painful in themselves and illustrating a phase of modern religious life. Mr. Leopold George Agar-Ellis, as Lord Clifden once was, proposed marriage to the Hon. Harriet Stonor, a daughter of Lord Camoys. Theirs was one of those "mixed marriages" which Cardinal Manning used to call "Lucifer matches"; for he was a Protestant and she the daughter of a house devoted to the Roman Catholic faith. But things were made easy for the lovers by the compliance of the bridegroom with the request of the bride that the children of the union, if any, should be brought up Catholics.

MR. AGAR-ELLIS was at that time member for Kilkenny, a name of proverbial contention, which was soon to be applied jestingly to the husband and wife, whose disagreements had their culminating tragedy in the husband's determination to bring up his two children as Protestants. The mother's conscience was involved; she appealed to the ante-natal agreement of the father as to their baptism and belief, but all in vain. And the law of England, invoked, and invoked again on appeal, decided that the father could not sign away his parental rights. The choice of his daughters' religion rested with him, not with the mother who bore them. The situation was, no doubt, intolerable, and was one that even time could not heal. Years passed on; the two daughters married. Mr. Agar-Ellis succeeded to the peerage, and his wife, never ceasing to lament, turned her tastes and talents to various uses so that she might earn, as far as possible, an independence of her own. The late Mr. James Anthony Froude was always cited as a sympathiser with Mr. Agar-Ellis, and was said to base on this case a rhetorical passage in one of his books, in which he accuses the Roman Church of setting father against daughter, and daughter against father.

MR. MONTEITH, of Carstairs, is of Carstairs no longer. He has sold the family property in Lanarkshire, so long associated with his own name and with his father's. The father and Tennyson were close friends at Cambridge, where Monteith was one of "The Apostles"; and, twenty years later, the Poet Laureate himself visited Carstairs and revived the old friendship. Of the two men, Mr. Monteith was the first to die. His son succeeded to the estate and to a fortune fully adequate for its maintenance. He had a large family, whom he sought to benefit by speculations on the Stock Exchange, but these were not so fortunate in their issues as he had hoped. An ex-Lord Provost of Glasgow is the new owner of Carstairs.

GENERAL SIR WILLIAM BUTLER, who came to London to report himself at the War Office this week, is now back at Devonport, taking up the duties of his new command. The voyage of the Norman home from the Cape, with Sir William and Lady Butler on board, was a particularly favourable one, but it did not lack an incidental sadness. One night a young governess died, and was buried the next morning, Sir William Butler reading the service. "To see that poor little body," says the private letter of one of the passengers, "tilted into the heaving, inky ocean, to be left in that utter solitude, was to see what I can never forget. The few flowers we had placed on the body floated for a few seconds amid the foam, and then disappeared also. We had a dance on board the next evening, and a concert the succeeding one, where I noticed that the piano was draped with the same Union Jack that had covered her bier."

Triplet.

OH, the world was rich last night,
But it did awake so poor;—
Stars gone out in dreary light.
Oh, the world was rich last night!
Dawn has spread the dazzling height
Such a low and cloudy floor.
Oh, the world was rich last night,
But it did awake so poor!

From Winifred Lucas's "Fugitives."

Correspondence.

The Late Master of Balliol and Mr.
Herbert Spencer.

SIR,—In The Letters of Benjamin Jowett, just published, there are two references to Mr. Herbert Spencer, which, with your permission, I shall briefly deal with. Writing to the present Master of Balliol, Mr. Edward Caird, the late Master speaks of "those repulsive people who only believe what they can hold in their hands—Bain, H. Spencer," &c. The venerable ex-Prof. Bain would, I am sure, be greatly surprised when he read that sentence—so surprised that I shall expect him to take some notice of it in his forthcoming autobiography. Mr. Spencer's surprise would be even greater, for he has been at considerable trouble to demonstrate that not only does he believe in more than he can carry in his hands, but that he firmly believes in more than he can carry in his head. The mystery of the universe is to him a real mystery altogether beyond his powers, and he merely professes to cope with the fringe of the great problem. With idealists like Dr. Jowett the case is different, for they believe that there is no mystery at all; that they can solve everything; and that, in their own phraseology, all they believe can be carried in their hands.

In another letter Dr. Jowett says: "There is a fellow named Herbert Spencer, who knows a little of physical science, and gives back to scientific men their own notions in a more general form." This absurd statement is not surprising, for it has been made so often by all sorts and conditions of men that the gates of hard facts seem unable to prevail against it, and nothing that I can say is likely to stifle the currency of a piece of pure fiction. Mr. Spencer had begun to work out the theory of evolution as a universal process years before Darwin and Darwin's able exponent, Huxley, had written a line about the evolution of plants and animals; and the idea that he is merely an expounder and enlarger of other men's thoughts is the purest fustian imaginable.

We laugh at the medicine-man, and the rôle he plays among primitive people; but our laughter is out of place, for the medicine-man still flourishes in our midst, and is actively employed. He is changed a little, but not extinct. He is no longer required to guard us against evil spirits; but he is very much needed to guard us against teachers whose ideas do not fit in with our prepossessions and prejudices, and who would open to reason the sacred regions of our impressions. And the modus operandi of the latter-day medicine-man is patent enough. The above is an example.—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM C. MCBAIN.

Silly Prize Books

SIR,—I am a clergyman—no matter of what colour. Our church issues yearly a list of books from which prizes for its Sunday-schools are understood to be selected. Sir, if I had those books I would make a heap of them in some back-yard; I would drive a stake down through the midst of them, and to that stake I would nail a board bearing a plain and unmistakable description: "Rubbish Shot Here!" Or, better still, I would have the compilers read steadily down the list of their precious books until it was medically certified that they could approach no nearer the brink of insanity. We have been manufacturing little prigs persistently for many a year. Could any of your readers help me to something decent in the shape of a list of readable books for the Sunday-school?—I am, &c.,

A Library for Children.

SIR,—The correspondence respecting a Library for Children will soon close, and I venture to hope that you will then give a summary of the views of the various writers, with your verdict on the lists of books which they have contributed. The literary fairy tale is a product of the present day, and it seems to be thought indispensable for children. One correspondent implies that children's imagination ought to be cultivated, and his list contains only fairy stories. But intelligent children, though earnest and serious, are highly imaginative, and plain food sometimes suits them best. Crockett's delightful Sweetheart Travellers surely ought not to be wasted on young children, but reserved for an age when capable of appreciating its delicate humour.

I remember, when a small child, I was required to recite a piece of grandiloquent prose. I obeyed, mechanically; it was something about the brave barons, clad in armour, who met at Runymede. When I had finished, an old gentleman took me on his knee and related the story of the old woman who doubted the identity of herself and her dog. He must have thought me a very disagreeable child; I remained perfectly grave, and deeply humiliated at having been treated like a baby! Of course, I did not comprehend the wit and satire underlying the words. I must have met with many rebuffs since that day, but why is this one little incident of over eighty years ago so deeply impressed on my memory?

Of course, young children ought not to be allowed indiscriminate reading of the Bible or Shakespeare; his plays were not accessible to me, but my precious Elegant Extracts contained copious selections, which I read with pleasure and committed to memory, though not so thrillingly delightful as Paradise Lost.

To the pure all things are pure, and no young child ever took harm by looking into a book not intended for children. I would never have eaten a prohibited gooseberry nor read a prohibited book; but no one ever directed my studies or gave any heed to them. I believe that no work read and understood in childhood is ever really lost, it remains in some corner of the little brain. The High School did not exist in my childhood, my parents fancied that they could not afford a governess, I had almost no education, yet since my marriage I have associated with the intellectually great ones of the earth in fair mental content. I have just taken up the stray volume of the Spectator which charmed me in the days gone by. It contains a great deal of what I could not have fairly understood; but I only cared to read what was intelligible, and I still mystify my friends with the love story of Shalum and Hilpún when discussing the evils of procrustation.

A lady writer in the ACADEMY records the delight with which she read Vanity Fair—at that time she must have crossed the Rubicon of twelve—and the rapture still exists. Scott, the hero of my youth, is out of date—fin de siècle indeed! Vanity Fair versus The Bride of Lammermoor!—I am, &c., Woburn Sands: September 12, 1899.

SIR,—With reference to the correspondence under the above heading in your columns, may I call your attention to the absolute omission of Æsop's Fables in all the lists you publish?

Surely such a guide to common sense "made easy" should not be allowed to drop into oblivion by the rising generation.

My little girl (ætat 12) sends the following as her list out of the books in her own or her brother's (ætat 10) possession:

1. Æsop's Fables (L'Estrange).
2. Struwwelpeter.
3. Grimm's Tales.

4. Pilgrim's Progress.
5. Black Beauty.
6. Water Babies.
7. H. C. Andersen's Tales.
8. A Book of Nursery Songs and Rhymes.
9. Little Lord Fauntleroy.
10. Arabian Nights.
11. Alice in Wonderland.
12. The Rose and the Ring.

C. S. H.

SIR,—The books that are "in demand" for children are not necessarily those which the children themselves love. The following is a list of those which two lonely little children in a remote country vicarage loved and read and re-read to the exclusion of many others which their own little library and the larger library of the grown-up world, to which they had free access, afforded:

Swiss Family Robinson.
The Rival Crusoes.
Wild Flowers. Pratt.
White's Selborne.
Uncle Tom's Cabin (a very fearful joy).
The Wide, Wide World.
Countess Kate. Yonge.
The Robins. Trimmer.
The Fairchild Family.
Heroes. Kingsley.
Parent's Assistant.
Funny Fables for Little Folks.
Struwwelpeter.
Lamb's Tales.
The Cricket on the Hearth.
Bride of Lammermoor.
Ivanhoe.
Guy Mannering.
Marmion.

In this list books for almost infants ranked with those which might seem to belong to more developed minds, but all were loved with no sense of incongruity. Portions of Shakespeare were also delighted in, but no complete play. —I am, &c.,

Dante in English.

SIR,—Your reviewer is not likely to increase the number of Dante readers by commending Cary to their notice. How many who might have come to care for Dante—the poet himself, his poetry, or his philosophy—must have found the Comedy via Cary not only inaccessible, but positively repulsive—a frowning bastion. The fact is, we still wait for the translator of Dante who shall win disciples for the master. Longfellow's translation quenches all the fire of the original; Norton's modernity destroys its illusion; Butler's can only be enjoyed by continual reference to the Italian; Shadwell's Purgatorio reads almost like a parody; while Plumptre's is simply intolerable.

Better than all for those ignorant of Italian is Musgrave's (Inferno)—although he is driven to play queer pranks with the original because of the exigencies of his verse system. But any of these is preferable to the oppressive dead-beat of Cary's iambs.—I am, &c., F. KETTLE.

Clapham, S.W.: September 12, 1899.

[I agree with Mr. Kettle that the ideal translation of the Comedy has yet to come. But I yet prefer Cary to the others; for I think, with the poet to whom I referred, that terza rima is a fundamentally defective metre in English, nor do I relish the flat attempt to follow it without rhyme—on which it wholly depends. I dare not emulate that authority's bold condemnation of the original metre—not being myself an eminent poet. But though Cary is no master of versification, he still keeps to honest English blank verse—for which I like him. But all this is immaterial. My true point was, that Dante was too great for his greatness to depend on mere verbal and metrical form; that he could impress himself on the reader in any decent translation. I first so met him—and was subdued despite "Cary's iambs."—YOUR REVIEWER.]

AUTHOR'S EDITION DE LUXE OF THE WORKS OF MARK TWAIN.

MARK TWAIN is, all things considered, America's greatest living writer, and the readers of his books all the world over must be numbered by the million; indeed, he has, with but one possible exception, the largest audience of any author now using the English language. This audience is made up of many varied publics; and he has attained his immense popularity because the qualities which he possesses in so high a degree appeal to the moods of so many different classes of readers of all ages.

MARK TWAIN is constantly spoken of as "the world's greatest humorist," and it is undoubtedly as a humorist pure and simple that he is best known and best beloved. He is, however, much more than a favoured exciter of mirth; he is, indeed, many-sided. His readers find in him the entertaining storyteller; the picturer of old times and local conditions, mostly autobiographic, such as are recorded in his three great Mississippi Valley books; the historical novelist, in romances the scenes of which are laid in Europe of the past, embellished by a fantastic setting; the rough-and-ready philosopher; the keen and clever observer of passing events; and the brilliant essayist.

"I have no hesitation in saying that MARK TWAIN is one among the greatest of contemporary makers of fiction," says Mr. Andrew Lang; "I claim for MARK TWAIN a foremost place among the benefactors of the world," writes Mr. W. T. Stead; and the undoubtedly growing appreciation of his great services, both as a humorist and a deep thinker on social problems, has created a widespread desire for a Complete Uniform Edition of his writings; in response to which demand Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS have pleasure in announcing the publication of an EDITION DE LUXE in 23 volumes, to be called which it is hoped may be found worthy of the fame of its author. This edition will be illustrated, and will contain matter not hitherto included in any collection of his Works; it will be limited to 20 author's copies and to SIX HUNDRED COPIES for sale in Great Britain and its dependencies; it will be published at the rate of one entire work per month, the books extending to two volumes (see list below) being thus each issued in a complete form. The AUTHOR'S EDITION can be subscribed for only in sets, at 12s. 6d. net the volume; and the First Volume of each Set will be signed by the Author. Early application is necessary in order to secure copies of this limited AUTHOR'S EDITION, orders for which will be allotted strictly in the order of application.

The selection of Mr. BRANDER MATTHEWS to write a Biographical Criticism of MARK TWAIN and his literary work will, it is believed, enhance the value of the AUTHOR'S EDITION. This Introduction will be included in the first volume of the series, which volume will contain also a specially written Preface by MARK TWAIN. The arrangement of the twenty-two volumes will be as follows:—

BOOKS OF TRAVEL.

THE INNOCENTS ABROAD. Illustrated by PETER NEWELL. With Biographical Criticism by BRANDER MATTHEWS. 2 vols.

A TRAMP ABROAD. Illustrated by T. De Thulstrup. 2 vols.

Vol. II. Illustrated by A. B. Frost. 1 vol.

Vol. III. Illustrated by Dan Beard. 1 vol.

LITERARY ESSAYS. 1 vol.

Subscribers to the AUTHOR'S EDITION will have the opportunity of subscribing for any additional volumes of MARK TWAIN'S Works that may be written and published in the same form subsequently.

The type used will be large and clear, with ample spacing and generous margins; whilst the Old Chester pure rag deckle-edged paper, light in weight and soft to the touch, has been manufactured specially for this edition, with the "Mark Twain" water-mark upon every sheet. The size of the volumes will be octavo (about 8½ x 6 in. internal), and they will be bound in a handsome Holliston cloth with an artistic label on the back.

As regards the Illustrations, artists whose previous work seemed specially to fit them for the different volumes have been chosen. The volumes will contain also Portraits of the Author, reproduced from photographs and paintings executed at as nearly as possible the same times as those at which the different books were written. These portraits will be either photogravures or etchings by Mr. W. H. W. Bicknell, and will include a reproduction of the latest portrait of MARK TWAIN, the work of the Italian painter Spiridon, painted at Vienna in 1898; this Mr. Clemens declares to be the best portrait he ever had.

Copies may be ordered through all Booksellers. Prospectuses may also be had.

THE ORANGE GIRL.

By Sir WALTER BESANT,
Author of "All Sorts and Conditions of Men."

"The story is admirable.....It has all the force and appeal of a genuine contemporary narrative, amplified and idealised, to be sure, especially as regards the character of the fascinating heroine. The brilliant young girl begins life as a beauty of St. Giles's.....and might have ended as a beauty of St. James's.....she is a delightful and charming creature.....The story from first to last does not flag in picturesque spirit and interest."—Daily Chronicle.
"An animated picture.....the history of this perplexing, vital, and alluring woman."—Daily News.
"Jenny is one of those characters who take hold of us at once and inspire the reverence which perfect womanhood alone commands.....Taking the story as a whole, it is rarely that we come across one that gives so little opening for criticism, or one that so completely captures the interest and sympathy of the reader."—Literary World.

The Literary Week.

THE great Encyclopædia Biblica, which Prof. Robertson Smith initiated, and which Dr. Cheyne and Dr. Sutherland Black are carrying on, is at last sufficiently advanced for the first of the four parts to be announced by Messrs. Black for October. The remaining parts are in a state so near completion that they may be expected within two years, at intervals of six months.

WE regret that, owing to incorrect information, we stated last week that Mr. James Bowden had sold his publishing business to Messrs. Harper Bros., Doubleday, McClure & Co. This statement is without foundation, and in withdrawing it we offer Mr. Bowden our apologies for any annoyance it may have caused him.

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS's blank verse tragedy, "Paolo and Francesca," while waiting for representation at the St. James's Theatre, is to be given to the world in book form. Mr. Lane will be the publisher, and the work may be expected very soon. Mr. Alexander, who retains the entire acting rights, has sanctioned the publication.

ANOTHER poetical enterprise of Mr. Lane's in which Mr. Phillips will be represented is the publication of a shilling series of illustrated poems, entitled "Flowers of Parnassus." These flowers consist of poems chosen by the editor, Mr. Money-Coutts, and furnished with pictures by various artists. Among them are Mr. Phillips's "Marpessa," Shelley's "Sensitive Plant," Gray's "Elegy," and Tennyson's "Dream of Fair Women."

THE editor of the Century Magazine has secured for next year a contribution that promises to be of very great interest. This is a life of Oliver Cromwell from the pen of Mr. John Morley, wherein the Protector will be treated as a mystic before everything. We imagine that the work was completed before Mr. Morley began his researches into Mr. Gladstone's life. It seems to put the publication of the long-promised "Chatham" even further into the dim distance.

MR. MORLEY might indeed transfer his interests in Chatham to Lord Rosebery. The ex-Premier, we observe, has arranged to visit Bath next month to unveil tablets to the Earl of Chatham and William Pitt. Why not take over the completion of Mr. Morley's monograph too?

MR. BIRRELL has been asked to deliver the inaugural address of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution's lecture season this year. Last year, it will be remembered, Lord Rosebery was the speaker, and he chose for his subject illustrious book-loving statesmen, with particular reference to Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Birrell intends to discuss the question: "Is it possible to tell a good book from a bad one?"

It is possible that a new volume of plays by Mr. George Bernard Shaw may be published before long. This would contain "Cæsar and Cleopatra," "The Devil's Disciple," which Mr. Mansfield has been performing in America, and which Mr. Murray Carson is about to produce in London, and a new work which Mr. Shaw has recently completed for Miss Ellen Terry under the attractive title "Captain Brassbound's Conversion."

THE design for the William Black memorial beacon, the total sum subscribed for which now amounts to £505, has been made by Mr. Colin Hunter, A.R.A. The beacon, as has been stated, is destined for Duart Point, Isle of Mull, a dangerous spot, and its light will be a guide to all ships entering the Firth of Lorne, the Sound of Mull, and Loch Linnhe.

MR. HENRY NEWBOLT, the author of Admirals All, has made a selection from Froissart for the Macmillan Company of New York. It will be published under the title Stories from Froissart. We presume that an English edition will also be prepared.

A NEW exclusively literary paper has just been started in New York under the title Literary Life. It is bright and crisp, and its credo runs thus:

We believe in genuine international copyright.

We believe that literary property should be as sacred in its value and title as real estate.

We believe the pirate publisher should be electrocuted.

We believe the book thief should be sentenced to hard labour for life.

We believe the woman who uses a book wherein to press flowers should be exiled, and that the editor who sells his review copies to the second-hand dealer should be sent to Congress or given a consulship in Central Africa.

MR. G. W. STEEVENS, who has just left England for South Africa in the interests of the readers of the Daily Mail, promises to be one of the most widely read of authors during the next few weeks; for his Tragedy of Dreyfus, which we notice elsewhere, is to be followed, on October 4, by In India, a volume composed of the letters sent home to the Daily Mail when Mr. Steevens visited India, describing primarily the reception of the new Viceroy, and secondarily whatever else he saw that was picturesque and interesting.

MR. STEPHEN CRANE's new book, which Mr. Heinemann will publish in the autumn, is briefly an impressionistic history of the Cuban campaign. As special correspondent Mr. Crane saw the principal fighting, and he has now brought something of the method of his Red Badge of Courage to bear on the description of it. A portion of the book will first be printed in the Anglo-Saxon Review.

It will be noticed that we resume our Prize Competitions on page 317 of the present number.

In order to bring concretely before its readers the most widely-read books of 1899, the Daily Mail presented them with a drawing, a reproduction of which will be found below, wherein the position and size of each book indicate its degree of popularity according to inquiries at the circulating libraries. Thus, largest and first is A Double Thread, by Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler. Next is Mr. Richard Whiteing's No. 5, John Street, and so forth. We are a little disturbed by the spelling of Omar K'hayyam and The Political Struwwelpeter; but art has its eccentricities and they must be respected.

THE results of our efforts to guide public opinion are sometimes disheartening. The inquiry into the character of David Harum, which we published last week, did not deter Mr. W. P. James from writing in Saturday's St. James's Gazette that that novel's popularity was due to its "religious interest," although we showed clearly that the book's fascination lay largely in its pictures of horse-dealing. And the report comes from a large circulating library that more than one request has been made in the past few days for "David's Harem."

THIS is an age of matter-of-fact writing. For the moment lusciousness is in disfavour, imagery is on the shelf, honeycombs of metaphor no longer satiate us. Ouida, it is true, still writes, but Ouida is not what she was, and Canon Farrar has lost his pristine glow. And yet the ornate is not wholly dead, the florid not wholly extinct. Sumptuousness still lurks in the shy places. In an essay in the Dome, on cats, by "Israfil," are these sentences:

The sombre glory of a sulky Persian on a window-sill has often caught my roving gaze. I revel in that exquisite camel-curve of her sullen, smooth back: in the furry apex of each pointed ear; the immobility of her whiskers, long as the hair of Melisande; the steady glare of her magnificent eyes like orange flames; the seductive whiteness of her shirtfront's frilly fur, softer than snow; and the splendid sweep of the tail over the neat velvet paws so decorously placed. . . . I connect the common cat with the pussée goddess Pasht; with old, crumbling ruins and frowning gloomy architecture; with Memphis and Thebes; with leagues of desert sand; with mummies, skim-milk, rats, and unmusical wailings. The Persian I associate with rose gardens and silence and starlight; with cream and bulbuls; with brodered cushions and scented fountains; with splendid Saracenic curves and domes; and even with the lovely monotonous cadence of Omar's quatrains, though Hafiz catches her spirit better. I think it must be the bulbuls which the Persian cat has slain and eaten that give her voice its delicious, intimate timbre, and her purr its rich pianissimo.

A COMPARISON of the lists of the best books for children under twelve, which readers have been sending us for the past few weeks, reduces the ideal dozen, the number that we asked for, to these, in their order of popularity:

Alice in Wonderland.	Robinson Crusoe.
Andersen's Fairy Tales.	Arabian Nights.
Struwwelpeter.	Pilgrim's Progress.
Grimm's Fairy Tales.	Kingsley's Heroes.
Water Babies.	Stevenson's Child's Garden of Verses.
Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare.	Little Lord Fauntleroy.

St. Nicholas, however, whose ideal library for a nursery gave us the idea of asking for English opinions on the same subject, printed a list of twenty-five books. We, therefore, give below the next thirteen books which our correspondents recommend, again in their order of popularity:

The Jungle Book.	The Book of Nonsense.
Æsop's Fables.	Mother Goose.
Masterman Ready.	The Rose and the Ring.
Through the Looking-Glass.	Jackanapes.
Tom Brown's Schooldays.	Black Beauty.
Swiss Family Robinson.	The Blue Fairy Book.
The Boy's Own Paper.

THE list is altogether a very satisfactory one, we think. One or two points demand attention. Through the Looking-Glass, for example, has only three votes to Alice in Wonderland's ten, whereas in many families that we know it is considered the better book. Possibly some of our correspondents meant the title Alice in Wonderland to cover both. Mrs. Ewing we should have expected to see more favoured. Concerning the suitability of Stevenson's Child's Garden of Verses, we have already said something. Hawthorne's Wonder Book or Tanglewood Tales, or one of Miss Alcott's excellent stories, might, we think, take its place. But the list really wants very little tinkering, and generous uncles might safely adopt it as a sure guide.

It will be interesting, in connexion with our own results, once more to quote the St. Nicholas list:

Ivauhoe.	Child's Garden of Verses.
Quentin Durward.	Tom Brown's Schooldays.
The Pathfinder.	Pilgrim's Progress.
The Last of the Mohicans.	Sketch Book (Irving).
The Jungle Book.	The Man Without a Country (Hale).
Westward Ho!	Robinson Crusoe.
Arabian Nights.	Gulliver's Travels.
The Rose and the Ring.	Alice in Wonderland.
The Wonder Book.	Uncle Remus.
A Tale of Two Cities.	Jackanapes.
Dickens' Christmas Stories.	Wild Animals I Have Known (Thompson).
Longfellow.	Treasure Island.
Shakespeare.

Here, it will be noticed, is more solidity. But it must be borne in mind that the St. Nicholas aimed at a library for children, irrespective of age; whereas we asked particularly for books for children under twelve.

MR. H. C. MARILLIER's forthcoming work on Rossetti will be the most complete record of his career as a painter and draughtsman that has been prepared. A time may, of course, come when every scrap of an artist's output will be reproduced between two covers; but until that period the method followed by Mr. Marillier must be considered thorough enough. The illustrations comprise thirty photo-gravure plates and nearly 200 blocks, the examples reproduced being chosen from all the best Rossetti collections. With regard to the biographical side of the book, Mr. Marillier has been equally fortunate, among the authorities who have helped him being Mr. Watts-Dunton, Mr. W. M. Rossetti, and Mr. Fairfax Murray. The book will be published in October.

CRITICS of poetry can be very prosaic. Mr. Edwin Markham's famous poem, "The Man with the Hoe," has utterly dissatisfied one American reader of independent spirit. The toiling agriculturist is to this gentleman no subject for commiseration. A man with a hoe is, to his mind, to be felicitated—he, at least, has a means of honest livelihood, and a natural one at that. Hence he has written to the New York Sun:

What about the man without the hoe? he who cannot get work, or, having the opportunity to labour, won't do it? There are thousands of young men in this country who have been educated up to the point where the honest and healthful occupation of their fathers in the field has become distasteful to them, and, in many cases, they have grown to be ashamed of it and of their parents. In European countries, particularly, there are multitudes of young men, the younger sons of titled people, for instance, who have been taught that common labour or work in the trades is beneath them, and they sink their individuality, their manhood, and their future in the ranks of the army and in petty government positions. They must have money, but they must earn it only in a "genteel" way. These are the men without the hoe—the real brothers to the ox. Who shall tell their story? Who shall best sing the bitter song of the incapables who walk the earth, driven hither and thither like beasts by the implacable sentiment of a false social education, suffering the tortures of the damned and bringing distress upon those dependent on them because they have lost that true independence of soul that comes to him who dares to labour with his hands, who wields the hoe and is the master of his destiny.

The writer would like to see a good poem written on these lines, and the subject is a great one. He therefore offers to give for the best poems written on this general subject 400 dols. as first prize, 200 dols. as second prize, and 100 dols. as third prize; the competition to be decided by a committee of three, one to be the editor of the Sun, and the others to be Mr. T. B. Aldrich and Mr. E. C. Stedman (if those gentlemen will be willing to serve on such a committee). All poems to be sent in to the editor of the Sun before October 15 next. Brevity, strength of sentiment and expression, and literary grace and beauty to be the factors of merit.

There is time for English poets to compete, too.

ANOTHER kind of prize poem has just been called for by a Flemish lady—Mme. Keelhoff, Rue de l'Industrie, 2, Brussels—whose enthusiasm for the cause of total abstinence has led her to the length of offering a reward for the best song against the abuse of strong drink. Her zeal, however, does not extend to offering a larger prize than twenty-five francs.

MR. ALGERNON ASHTON has lately added Rossetti's grave at Birchington to his list of tombs needing renovation. But another critic, Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer, objects to this inclusion. He reports: "The design on the cross is a little obscured by lichens, but that, I suppose, one must expect. The grass, too, is a little out of condition, but that, too, in these days of drought is not to be wondered at." Mr. Hueffer concludes: "If one wished to preserve the cross from the effects of the weather or the grass from those of footsteps one ought, I suppose, to enclose the whole beneath a large glass case. But this would not be pretty, however trifling the expense."

A CORRESPONDENT sends us the following motto for General Mercier:

Only the actions of the Jouaust
Smell sweet and blossom in the dust.

MR. DOOLEY's remarks on Europe, which are to be printed Monday by Monday in the Westminster Gazette, promise to be very entertaining. He began this week with a commentary on the Anglo-American sports recently held in London. "Ye get to th' Olympian games," says Mr. Dooley, "be suffocation in a tunnel. Whin ye come to, ye pay four shillin's, or a dollar in our degraded currency, an' stan' in th' sun an' look at th' Prince iv Wales. Th' Prince iv Wales looks at you, too, but he don't see ye." Mr. Dooley then describes the events. "I was that proud iv me belovid counthry," he says, "that I wanted to take off me hat there an' thin an' give the colledge yell iv th' Ar-rchey Avnoo Reform School. But I was resthtrained be a frind iv mine that I met comin' over. He was fr'm Matsachosetts, an', says he: 'Don't make a disturbance,' he says. 'We've got to create a fav'able impression here,' he says. 'Th' English,' he says, 'niver shows enthushyasm,' he says. 'Tis regarded as unpolite,' he says. 'If we yell,' he says, 'they'll think we want to win,' he says, 'an' we didn't come over here to win,' he says. 'Let us show thim,' he says, 'that we're gintlemin, be it iver so painful,' he says. An' I resthtrained meself be puttin' me fist in me mouth."

A LITTLE American society, called "The Brothers of the Book," which from time to time circulates limited editions of sympathetic writings, has just issued Stevenson's essay on "The Morality of the Profession of Letters," first published in the Fortnightly Review for April, 1881.

IN future the Windmill, a little artistic quarterly that has not yet had time to become very well known, will be published by the New Century Press.

THE Paris correspondent of the Times can generally be trusted to telegraph the right comment in words acceptable to the British public. It may be doubted, however, whether the gentleman who sits at the other end of the wire at one o'clock in the morning, anxious to arrive at the essential facts and go home, is altogether pleased with this embroidery. Last Wednesday, reading our Times, we had a vision of the telegraph instrument ticking out Mr. De Blowitz's Paris despatch. Thus it began:

The — Supreme — Will — which — governs — human — destinies — has — inscrutable — designs — in — which — we — are — bound — to — acquiesce — — without — seeking — to — penetrate — the — mystery.

The news which followed was the death of M. Scheurer-Kestner.

WE print elsewhere in this number a protest, by a writer who remembers the intellectual agonies of his youth, against the employment of Gray's "Elegy" as a guide to poetry for boys. Many of our readers who remember their schooldays can probably remember other instances where the examination of a beautiful poem by slow and painful stages has set up a prejudice against it which time has not yet been able altogether to remove. And also they may remember absurd misconceptions of words and phrases, similar to the one which our correspondent mentions. We shall be pleased to put on record such experiences if any be sent to us.

THE new Chair of Education at Owens College, Manchester, has been accepted by Mr. H. L. Withers, since 1893 Principal of the Borough Road Training College at Isleworth. Mr. Withers was elected to a Classical Scholarship at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1882, and he obtained a First Class in Classics both in Moderations and in the Final Honours School. He was an assistant master at the Manchester Grammar School, and afterwards at Clifton College, and has been an examiner under the Oxford and Cambridge Schools Examination Board. The professor will have a seat on the Senate of the College and on the Board of Studies of the Victoria University. An assistant and the Mistress of Method in the Women's College will be associated with the professor in the work of the department.

LAST week Mr. Madison Cawein, the American poet, whom Mr. Howells, in an article in Literature, has just introduced to many persons, was referred to in the ACADEMY as a Canadian. This was an error. Mr. Cawein is an American.

Bibliographical.

VERY interesting is Mr. Nutt's announcement that the next volume of the "Tudor Translations" will be a reprint of The Courtier of Baldassare Castiglione, as "done into English" by Sir Thomas Hoby, and published originally in 1561. There are, of course, much later translations of the work into English—notably that by A. P. Castiglione, which dates from 1727, and that by R. Samber, which came out two years later. Still, the Hoby version is to be preferred. It was evidently popular in its day, for there was an edition in 1577, another in 1588, and another in 1603. For the "Tudor Translation" which is to follow The Courtier one cannot feel quite so enthusiastic, inasmuch as it is to consist of the Urquhart-and-Motteux translation of Gargantua and Pantagruel (Books I.-V.), "faithfully reprinted," to be sure, "from the éditiones principes." This will run to three volumes. Reprints of Urquhart-and-Motteux—of a kind—have been plentiful of late years; there have been three in the late decade. But, of course, the "Tudor" reprint will be well worth possessing.

The announcement of a new translation of King Alfred's Bæthrus into modern English reminds us that this service has already been done for us twice at least—by J. S. Cardale (in 1829) and by Samuel Fox (in 1835). More interesting and attractive is the promise of a new translation of Asser's Life of Alfred; that may be said to be wanted in very deed. On the other hand, a threatened addition to the literature of The Tale of Beowulf is a little disquieting, seeing that the editions and versions of the Tale are really numerous. There are the versions by Kemble (1833), Wackerbarth (1849), Thorpe (1855), Arnold (1876), Lumsden—in rhyme—(1881), Earle (1892), and Morris and Wyatt (1895). Then there are American versions, dated 1882 and 1892 respectively. I suppose the standard edition is that of Wyatt, reproduced so lately as last year.

Somebody has lately been congratulating himself on having seen a copy of Miss Braddon's very first work of fiction (if it be such)—Thrice Dead! or, The Secret of the Heath. This story seems to have come out in 1861 as a unit of the "Shilling Volume Library." But was Thrice Dead! its original title? Was it not The Trail of the Serpent?—the title under which the tale was translated into French two or three years after. Perhaps one of my readers may be able to settle the point—if it is worth settling. Another story by Miss Braddon—The Lady Lisle—appears to have been published in 1861, though "1862" be on the title-page. The author should write her Reminiscences (as everybody else does) and enlighten us not only about her early prose fictions, but about her play-writing, which, apparently, was more considerable than is generally supposed. No fewer than three plays from her pen were published in 1880-82.

Since I wrote the above paragraph the following letter has appeared in the Westminster Gazette, from Mr. Henry Williams:

Referring to your "Literary Notes and News" of the 18th inst., in which a correspondent describes the first real book of fiction written by Miss Braddon.

He is quite correct; it was published by my honoured father-in-law, the late W. M. Clark, of Warwick-lane, Paternoster-row, to whose business I succeeded.

When this book was issued I was a youth in his employ, and I opened the first parcel sent to us by Mr. Empson, of Beverley, then a customer we supplied with newspapers, books, &c.

The title was, I believe, Three Times Dead; or, The Mystery of the Heath, and was issued in penny weekly numbers, 8 pages 8vo; the cuts were awful.

It is now nearly forty years since the first number was issued, but I remember glancing at the opening sentences, which run thus:

"It didn't rain any harder in the Town of Sloppington-on-the-Sloshy than it rained anywhere else," &c.

I have at times spoken about this to Mr. W. Tinsley and other younger members of the trade who have since published for Miss Braddon, but they usually shrugged their shoulders incredulously.

The initials "H. L. B." appended to an account (in a contemporary) of the new National Theatre at Christiania are obviously those of Mr. H. L. Braekstad, a Scandinavian, who has been resident for some years in England, and has done much, in an unassuming way, to make Scandinavian fiction and drama known to English people. For instance, he has produced English versions of two books by P. C. Asbjørnsen (1881 and 1897), of Björnson's Gauntlet (1890) and Paul Lange (1899), of A. C. Edgren's True Women (1890), and J. Lie's Commodore's Daughters (1892) and Niobe (1897). Just lately he has given us a translation of Johansen's With Nansen in the North.

Messrs. Nimmo announce a cheaper edition of their reprint of Captain Gronow's Recollections, which they gave to the world first in 1889, and again in 1892. Originally the work came out in four series—each separately entitled—in 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1866 successively. Would it not be a good idea to issue a reprint of the Recollections curtailed of the passages which for the present-day reader have a rococo air? A volume of selections, published at a small price, ought to attract the lovers of anecdote and gossip.

The novel which Miss Edith Henrietta Fowler is to give us will be her first, for her literary efforts, so far, have been confined modestly to the production of tales for children—to wit, The Young Pretenders (1895), The Professor's Children (1897), and Hugh's Burden Bundle (1897). There will naturally be curiosity as to the relation her fare for adults may bear to that with which her sister has hitherto supplied the public.

We are promised a new illustrated edition of Blake's Songs of Experience. These, it will be remembered, were included in a Blake volume, published in 1897, for which Mr. C. Ricketts provided the "decorations." The Songs of Experience have usually been printed with the Songs of Innocence—vide the editions of 1789, 1839, 1866, and 1868.

Only two years ago Mr. John Mackie gave us an Australian tale which he called They that Sit in Darkness. Now Mr. I. Zangwill proposes to present us with a book of stories entitled They that Walk in Darkness. Of course, sitting and walking are very different things.

For the "Social England" series Miss Lucy Toulmin Smith will write the volume on Mysteries and Miracle Plays. The choice is a good one, for we all remember the lady's edition of the York Plays, as well as that of Gorboduc—both of them excellent bits of scholarship.

A Mad King.

The Romance of Ludwig II. of Bavaria. By Frances Gerard. (Hutchinson. 16s.)

IN all madness is felt a dreadful allurements—the allurements of a mind fed by no mortal fires. In his preoccupation the madman appeals to us freshly as a grandiose babe. He is incapable of appearing, as we sane ones do, in perennial disguise. His deeps are springing; he has the candour of relentless disease. And yet, as though he were a true artist instead of simply a morbid subject, his secret eludes us all; he creates without paint or clay; he dreams without repose; he seems terribly alive. Perhaps—whatever the surgeons say—he lives partly in that other world which by every device we ignore, and, like someone in a tale of genius, has seen Fear.

And so it is with reluctance that we approach the task of reviewing a book of gossip about a madman—for madness is high tragedy, and gossip, however amiable, is an old wife's business.

Let it be said at once that Miss Frances Gerard is a typical lady bookmaker. She found her task an "absorbing and delightful occupation" (there is nothing like having a taste for pathology, is there?); she dotes on her hero's "wonderful" and "unfathomable" eyes; she is arch and omniscient about his love affairs, sagacious about his education, and full to the brim with feminine tolerance and pity. Withal, she has some humour and penetration; but she is also a little inconsistent, inaccurate, and inconsequent. Her "romance" is just a book of Bavarian bits; and one ventures to think that it was the sumptuosities of Ludwig's castles that accounted for the "delightful" element in her task. The illustrations, of which there are more than fifty, are admirably reproduced; and the whole is well designed to fritter away the studious hours of even those who detest buttonholing and swear by method. The index might have been more serviceable. It is absurd to give nothing but page-references to Ludwig II., who is, ostensibly, the book itself.

Having made our strictures and paid our tributes, let us return to the King. He was born in 1845 and died in 1886. In his twoscore years he lived more in the company of the Grande Monarque and Louis Quinze than in that of his contemporaries. He fell in love, but it was with Marie Antoinette. In the bedroom of the Residenz Schloss her bust was the first object that would meet his eyes on waking. True, he had shown regard for the Grand Duchess Marie Alexandrowna, but he never seems to have asked the crucial question. True, he was engaged to the Duchess Sophie Charlotte, but he broke his troth; and Prof. Gore alleges, in a recent article, that "he took the marble bust which she had given him of herself and threw it out of the window." There seems to have been a distinct lack of healthy amativeness in Ludwig, and this expressed itself in a marked intolerance to any presumption on the part of women. Thus, Prof. Gore relates how an actress, who had pleased him by a recitation, requested permission to see "his most poetic bed-chamber"—the Million-Dollar Bed-chamber, as the American magazine characteristically describes it—at Herrenschiemsee. The actress "was coolly dismissed for her effrontery, and the servants were ordered to fumigate the room in which she had been received." Similarly, Miss Gerard tells how on one occasion Fraulein Schefszky was asked to sing for His Majesty while he rowed on the lake of the winter garden attached to the Residenz Schloss. "The lady, being more a Walküre than a fairy, her weight was too much for the little skiff, which capsized her into the water." The King left her, cavalierly, to the mercy of the boatman, and it was said that Wagner fished her out with a boat-hook. Rumour also averred that the accident took place through the King's resentment at Fraulein Schefszky's venturing to pass her hand through his hair. It was Fraulein Schefszky, by the way, who was in the habit of making the King from time to time very handsome presents, which he received with the understanding that he would afterwards pay for them. . . . One Christmas she presented her royal patron with a costly carpet, with which he was highly pleased, thanking her heartily and desiring repayment to be made at once. His secretary, however, astonished at the high price of the article, caused inquiries to be made, when it came out that Schefszky was making a large profit for herself out of the transactions. The King was so disgusted . . . that he at once dismissed the singer from the Grand Opera, ordering, however, that the full salary should be paid to her for the time she had been engaged.

Such a woman was not worthy of a flirtation; but Ludwig's extraordinary treatment of his fiancée, afterwards the Duchesse d'Alençon, who nobly perished in the flames of the Paris Bazaar of 1897, shows an abnormal sexual nature; for, be it understood, we are not dealing with the case of a "shifting of the fire," but of absence of fire. He loved Marie Antoinette. He also loved Wagner, and Wagner was, perhaps, the only formidable rival of that heroic shade. The two volumes of Wagner's Letters recently put forth by Mr. W. Ashton Ellis tell the tale of Bayreuth—a veritable saga in its way. This is how Wagner writes to Frau Wille of Ludwig, after an interview (May 4, 1864). Our quotation is from Mr. Ellis's translation:

You know that the young King of Bavaria had me searched for. To-day I was conducted to him. Alas! he is so handsome and intelligent, so splendid and so full of soul, that I fear lest his life should vanish like a fleeting dream of gods in this vulgar world. He loves me with the depth and glow of a first love; he knows and fathoms everything about me, and understands me as my soul.

It was the opinion of one who knew him well, that Ludwig had no ear for music. But the world of "Lohengrin" was just made for him. He who in his degeneracy craved to be drawn about by peacocks, was delighted with a bloodless opportunity of wearing silver armour and going about in a swan boat (as they do at Earl's Court). He adored spectacles; his was the bizarrerie of a noble Roman in the decadence. For him alone the whole play must recommence after the public have withdrawn. For him alone in the mirror room at Herrenschiemsee thousands of candles must burn, and no candle be lit twice. It is said that he intended his projected, but never built, castle of Falkenstein to be paved with jewels. His resources, however, gave out, like those of the Emperor of China when Aladdin invited him to fill in the one unjewelled lattice of his magical palace. And perhaps the depletion of his treasury really did hasten his end. It was a shock in his dream life, which had come to require prolonged solitude and a reticence in others which they found unbearable. They must not look at him; they must scratch the panel of his door to show their comprehension of his commands. He had evaded warfare, that healthy, but expensive dream of the world. He signed his country into a kind of vassalage before dressing for "Lohengrin" one fine day. Kissengen had known him not, and at Sedan Germany triumphed without him. It was a pity, for military ardour, like love, is a vent. More than that, it is a sea washing away fear.

How the end came we have no space to tell. Yet must we lament the crudity that attaches to un-kinging. For a man with the Grand Monarque for his companion, with Marie Antoinette for his "bodiless paramour," to be un-kinged was awful. And to be un-kinged not with shouts, but with whispers and the askance looks of science and pity, was unbearable. Thereupon Ludwig put an end to the situation, and with him perished the tactless but heroic Dr. Gudden. He had become a jailbird, and showed sure sanity in choosing a moment for his escape when he was still handsome and articulate, while the conflagration of his reason was still blazing and the dead ash of idiocy was yet unfallen.

But, for sign of the dreadful end averted, still ring across the chasm of years two sentences of the hapless King. One is spoken by the boy of twelve caught in the act of bowstringing his brother Otto: "This is no business of yours; this is my vassal, and he has dared to resist my will. He must be executed." The other is spoken by the man of forty-one of the Commissioners who decided on his mental state: "Let the traitors be thrown into the deepest dungeon, loaded with chains, and leave them to die of starvation."

From Mike Howe to Ned Kelly.

The Story of the Australian Bushrangers. By G. E. Boxall. (Sonnenschein. 6s.)

BUSHRANGING has never filled quite that place in a boy's ambition which highway robbery and piracy hold. We cannot say why exactly, except that the term is somewhat vague, and, boys being no less snobs than their parents are, the association of convicts with the pastime may have damped their ardour. Australia, try how we will, is not romantic. Boys or men, we cannot locate our ideals there. Moreover, the stories of famous bushrangers are very ugly. They include a vast amount of wanton shedding of blood and taking of life, and they are generally lacking in any kind of picturesqueness or chivalry. The old highwayman had standards of manners; he was occasionally something very nigh a gentleman; he robbed and passed on, needing the money only; his heart was empty of rancour. But the bushranger was an escaped prisoner, with a heart black with rage against a cruel convict system. He took to the bush because no other part of Australia was safe for him, and he preyed upon men as much out of revenge as for booty. Hence his deeds were almost always brutal. The bushranger, to put it concisely, may be described as a highwayman plus convict.

In this country it is hardly worth while to break prison and run. The distances are so trifling, the cover so sparse, the country is so netted with telegraph lines, that capture, except in very rare instances, is certain. But in Australia in the old days the escaped prisoner had the world before him. Recapture was, of course, possible, and it often occurred; while death from starvation was possible too, and occurred not much less frequently; but the opportunity of eluding both were very considerable, especially to a man in a position to treasure liberty as a miser gold, and a man, too, in whom years of oppression had implanted a hatred of all power and an utter carelessness of human life. Not that all the crime of Australia in the period under discussion—the first half of this century—were committed by escaped convicts and assigned servants—i.e., convicts outside the prison walls—but the greater ones were, and most of the bushrangers reached their profession vid gaol. Mr. Boxall, whose pages, though somewhat monotonous and crowded, are very rich in interest and lucid in their information, sympathises with these depredators to an extent which may trouble comfortable English law-keepers not a little.

The facts being as I have stated [says he], the wonder is not that large numbers of prisoners took to the bush, but that all did not do so; and the more we study the early history of the convict settlements, the less we feel inclined to blame the early bushrangers, however savage or atrocious their actions were.

By a stroke of irony the original idea of bushranging was first put into the head of the convict by a Government official. In 1805, food being scarce in Van Dieman's Land owing to the non-arrival of store ships, the Lieut.-Governor ordered the temporary liberation of the convicts and sent them into the woods to catch kangaroo and other wild animals. On the arrival of the store ships the convicts were recalled. Those that would not come were the first bushrangers. The names of many of these independent spirits are lost, but in course of time it began to be understood that the boldest among them, and the ringleader in the numerous thefts and outrages, was one Whitehead. Whitehead, then, was the First Bushranger. To him, when in 1814 the bullet which was to end the career of most of his kind penetrated a vital spot, succeeded Michael Howe. Howe (a transported highwayman) was a man of character, a tactician. He provided himself with a native wife, "Black Mary," whose knowledge of the bush did him infinite service. Many of the later bushrangers came to grief through insufficient acquaintance with their hiding ground. Howe took a right view of his importance, even daring, under a flag of truce, to leave the security of the bush and parley with the Governor at Hobart, where "he became very popular." Howe, who must have been a humorist, had asked for this meeting in a letter "From the Governor of the Ranges to the Governor of the Town." The negotiation, however, failed, Howe became suspicious, and rather than run risks of waiting for his pardon he returned to the ranges, and there continued his robberies until in an affray with the military his brains were beaten out.

The history of the bushrangers is a succession of fierce contests and sudden death. In the stories of the American gold craze in the late forties there is sufficient lightness and freedom in man's relations with his gun and pistol; but never can triggers have been pulled with more frequency and unconcern than in the volume before us. A bushranger in a corner either was shot or himself shot his way out. It would seem that in the infected regions to find oneself looking down the barrel of a gun was the commonest of experiences. Why more people did not carry arms is something of a puzzle to the reader of Mr. Boxall's pages. One very ordinary device of the bushrangers, for example, was for three to arrive suddenly at a station, where two of them simultaneously presented themselves in the shearing shed and the house. One man seems to have been all that was needed to intimidate the shed, perhaps containing thirty shearers; one all that was required for the house; so that the other was free to search for gold and valuables. Had the shearers carried revolvers too the result must have been different: or so at least one thinks, writing now, many years after, in the security of England. Yet the old fable of the cholera comes to mind—"I killed but a thousand, fear killed the rest." Fear must have operated powerfully on the side of the bushrangers: they were known to be desperate, sticking at nothing; report had magnified their strength and their exploits; their presence was thus mesmeric, paralysing action.

To Michael Howe succeeded, as a bushranger of parts, Matthew Brady, a transported forger. For a while he was a terror in Van Diemen's Land, but was at last betrayed by a convict named Cowan who wormed his way into the gang. For this despicable service Cowan received a free pardon, several hundred pounds, and a passage home. When Brady was condemned to be hanged (Mr. Boxall always says "hung," as if bushrangers were so much meat), many ladies in court showed their sympathy for him by weeping so loudly that the judge had to pause. Howe and Brady were, however, mere provincial operators. The first really notable mainland bushranger was John Lynch. Lynch was one of the most extensive and cold-blooded murderers in the history of crime. A passage from his confessions will indicate his extraordinary state of mind:

After their supper Lynch was lying under his [stolen] dray when a mounted trooper rode up and asked Frazer [a peaceable squatter, who, with his wife, had become Lynch's unsuspecting travelling companion] some questions about a dray which had been stolen. . . . The Frazers were unable to give him any information, and the trooper rode away without noticing Lynch. . . . This narrow escape gave Lynch a terrible shock. He lay awake all night thinking of the danger he was running by keeping this drag. He "prayed to Almighty God to assist and enlighten" him in this emergency, and, feeling much strengthened, he resolved to kill the Frazers and take theirs.

After Lynch we come to William Westwood, known as Jackey Jackey, the gentleman bushranger. He was transported for some boyish peccadillo when only sixteen, so the Government must probably bear the whole responsibility for his career. About Jackey Jackey's name clusters as apocryphal a mass of story as that which lends glory to the names of Dick Turpin and Claude Duval in this country. With Duval's chivalry in returning to ladies their purses and craving a dance Jackey Jackey also is credited, and Turpin's forced ride to York to set up an alibi is his also, except that York becomes an Australian town. (But this feat, according to Defoe's Itinerary, was performed many years before Turpin.) Jackey Jackey, however, had authentic adventures which entitled him to respect, and his name is still mentioned with admiration. He was one who had education. Mr. Boxall tells of an old fellow who related to him the story of a meeting between Jackey Jackey and Governor Gipps. "You and me," said he, "couldn't have understood what they said. It was all English, but they talked grammar." Jackey Jackey delighted to run into danger, and though more than once captured he always escaped. At last, however, he was securely taken and cooped in the prison on Norfolk Island. In 1844 a new governor was appointed, with instructions to return to the rigid rules of the earlier days. He did so, but exceeded his duty by refusing the convicts certain ameliorations which he had promised. The men became incensed beyond endurance, and Jackey Jackey constituted himself leader, with the remark: "I've made up my mind to stand this oppression no longer. But, remember, I'm going to the gallows. If any man funks let him stand out. Those who wish to follow me, come on." Mutiny then began in earnest, and five officials were killed, all by Jackey Jackey, before it was quelled. Thirteen men were hanged for it on October 13, 1846, among them the ring-leader, who left a long and very reasonable letter behind him. These sentences occur therein: "The spirit of the British law is reformation. Now years of sad experience should have told them that instead of reforming, the wretched man, under the present system, led by example on the one hand and driven by despair and tyranny on the other, goes on from bad to worse, till at length he is ruined body and soul." Jackey Jackey died at the age of twenty-six. From certain stories of him which Mr. Boxall gives we believe him to have been by nature a really fine fellow.

These, however, are ancient cases. To the ordinary man bushranging centres in the name of Kelly, and the chapters of Mr. Boxall's history which describe the audacities of the two brothers, Dan and Ned, in the seventies, are perhaps the cream of the book. Take him all round, Ned Kelly, who is called the last of the bushrangers, was also the greatest, and it is interesting to think that there are many men still in the prime of life who knew him and perhaps fought with him. The Kellys behaved in the grand manner. While a price of £500 was on their heads they entered towns, robbed banks, took possession of hotels, and defied the police. Their crowning ambition was to bail up a train, but treachery frustrated it. A terrible battle followed, wherein the famous suits of armour figured; and Dan Kelly was killed, Ned wounded and captured. Ned was hanged at Melbourne on November 11, 1880. In the last of the bushrangers we lost a magnificent soldier. He had the blood of a thousand terriers, and a certain grim humour too. One of his gang, who had the deaths of many men to answer for, was waited for during several weeks by the police lying in ambush near his mother's home, where they felt certain he would attempt to return. As a matter of fact he did return, saw the old woman, and got away again in safety; and the police had to capture him in some other way. The police, said Kelly, have no right to prevent a man from visiting his mother.

De Profundis.

O You that out of dreams I make,
Because it was my fathers' way,
A moment fashioned for the sake
Of hope upon a hopeless day:

The cowardly comfort, You I call!
The shameful solace of an hour;
Before You go the way of all
I trust a moment in Your power.

Vouchsafe me, in this time and place,
Such might as may my heart ensure
The superhuman fear to face,
The unendurable endure.

Purge me of dross with triple fire,
O Lord, if any gold there be:
If any gold in my desire,
That is the soul and whole of me.

Till when the leaden lights of morn
Beat on me proven, unafraid,
Who that I could not bear have borne—
Leave me, O Lord that I have made!

Yet, God ungraven! grant me yet
The final rest of my relief:
Grant Thou that I may Thee forget:
The cowardice of my unbelief.

The Decadence of Female Decadence.

The Roman Empresses. (Walpole Press.)

THERE is fashion in women, as in the dress of women. It is modish for women to be æsthetic or athletic, and forthwith we have a crop of damsels willowy and Lotticelli-like, or tall as goddesses and muscular as Guardsmen. Such is the determination of woman, that she will grow in the fashion, and add the Scriptural cubit to her stature if the mode demand it. These things are a mystery. There is a fashion also in female character, as evidenced in the novels of the day. The pale and pensive, the artistic, the sprightly and brilliant—all have their turn of popularity. At present, as a result of the "decadence," the wicked heroine is "in." She may be of varying patterns, but wickedness is essential—nay, had we not some while ago The Lives of Twelve Bad Women? Whether the fashion has affected society we are not aware; but it is writ large in literature, and has invaded the stage. The present book is therefore quite in the vogue. For the Roman empresses were most of them wicked; and several superbly, scenically wicked. A new work on such a subject would have distinct interest and value; but it is to be regretted that this is a mere reprint of an old translation of an eighteenth-century French book, by one De Serviez. It is full, faithful, not very discriminating, stilted, and dry—dry as mechanical handling and superfluous moral platitudes of the most approved fashion can make it.

A bad woman is a very bad woman. A bad man has usually some stump of a conscience left, and feels in it occasional aches and twinges which he refers automatically to the amputated organ. But a woman has none. Her wickedness comes from her with cheerfulness and comfort. The man is a strong swimmer in evil; but to the woman it becomes her element, her habitation. Drawn out (so to speak) on to the land of virtue, she could not breathe, but would plunge back with relief into her proper environment of vice. But while all are perfectly bad in an absolute sense, relatively there are degrees of perfection, as among good women we see. Perhaps the palm of perfection may be awarded to the wicked women of Italy. We say it with some hesitation. The women of the East we have hardly means for studying, or they might complicate the decision. Semiramis is too distant, too legendary; besides, she was a conqueror, and a perfect bad woman should not allow these things to divert her from the practice of her art. Catherine of Russia is in the same case, and even her badness is far from undisputed. It comes to this, that the North generally does not show up well, and England in particular makes a very poor display. We have to admit with regret that we have, perhaps, no bad women of any particular excellence. Queen Elinor enjoys a quite unfounded reputation on the strength of a mythical bowl of poison: she did not take away Rosamond's life, but in all probability merely her reputation, over the mediæval substitute for five o'clock tea. Besides, poison in a bowl—not even a phial: a thumping bowlful, as if she were going to poison a horse—and a dagger; what coarse, what primitive means! Neither of the Elinors has any solid evidence for her repute. The Castlemaines and Portsmouths of the Restoration were very poor copies of French originals—their own not in the first rank—and one of them turned charitable, or pious, or something equally fatal to serious claims. We are driven back upon the Mrs. Brownriggs, and women who murder their babies, and suchlike types of sordid achievement. France is much better. The Mme. de Pompadours, it is true (in spite of that single fine saying about the deluge), do not come up to one's highest ideals of badness in woman: but the ladies of Catherine de Medici's "bodyguard" had undoubtedly attained no common order of excellence, though their Italian training takes from them the supreme merit of originality. The same must be said of the Brinvilliers, who would otherwise have been a bad woman of real distinction; and generally, in this otherwise prolific period, there was no nationally French school of female wickedness. It derived strongly from Italy. In earlier French history there are some striking examples of native talent; but it is in the Carolingian time that we find real greatness. Brunnhilda and her rival queen were eminent examples of the true type. Nevertheless, there is a certain Teutonic coarseness and crudeness about the amours and murders of these Frankish queens which makes one adhere to Italy as the land where the bad woman has been produced in her perfection.

The mingling of softness, fire, and subtlety which makes Italy the most feminine of lands, and the Italian woman typically dear to the imagination of our poets, has caused it in all ages to produce the most arresting examples of female evil. Where woman is most woman for good she will also be most woman for evil. From Italy Webster took his "White Devil," Vittoria Corombona. Italy gave to the popular imagination its ideal type of the baleful, lovely woman in Lucrezia Borgia, though cold history avers that there have been much worse women, in Italy and out of it, than Lucrezia of the wonderful hair. Where the evil-doing of men works by preference in feminine ways; where poison, the naturally feminine weapon, was used till it became an art, it is not surprising that women should become conspicuous in evil. Yet more than this is needed: there must be something in the blood itself to explain the parity in wickedness between the woman of mediæval Italy and the woman of old Rome. The Romans were a martial race; they dealt in blood and iron. Yet the history of the Roman empresses recalls strongly the worst women of Italian mediæval history. The one period may be used to illustrate the other.

There is a daring about their action which we notice also in the mediæval Italian women. It is not the Northern, but the Latin races which produce the Amazonian women. Where the men are women, the women are men; and it was when the sturdy warrior-race of Rome was past that the Roman woman began to show her potentialities in politics and crime. So we notice the same trait in Caterina Sforza, standing on the walls of her city in armour, to defy Cæsar Borgia with indecorously masculine insults, and in the ruthless boldness of an Agrippina. The inventions of the novelist pale before these ladies' vigorous reality. In spite of our novelists, the day of the bad women is over; and no doubt, on the whole, it is as well.

A Boy Bishop.

Bishop John Selwyn: a Memoir. By F. D. How. (Isbister.)

THE late Master of Selwyn College, Cambridge, first saw the light in Waimale, his father (afterwards of Lichfield) being, in the year 1844, Bishop of New Zealand. He was educated at Eton, where he was captain of the field eleven, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, at which time he stroked the University eight, and secured a flukey place in the third class of the Classical Tripos. Here is a snapshot of him in those days:

I believe [writes the Provost of Eton] that I first saw John Selwyn on the Oxford towing-path, running with the University crew. He had come over from Cambridge to see his rivals. . . . He had borrowed a set of flannels from one of his friends at University College . . . and was running along very joyously in a University College blazer which was far too narrow for his broad shoulders, and a pair of white flannel trousers which were much too long for his legs. It was impossible not to notice this, as well as his bright, happy look, as of a man out for a good holiday and thoroughly enjoying himself.

He was ordained and, by his father, was presented to the benefice of St. George's, Wolverhampton, where he was found at the time of Bishop Patteson's murder. That event he took as a call to himself. "I say, old fellow, we must have a prayer about this" was his queer word to his friend and curate, Still (who called him Billy); and it was manifested to him that he should go. The mission work he did is very lightly touched; it is to be the subject, we are told, of a distinct book; but the letters home reveal the man in the most amiable light. His intense affection for his mother is one of the kindest traits of Bishop Selwyn's:

What [he writes] can I tell you of these thirty-seven years that are gone? Only that that is the number by which my love for you is multiplied. My manhood clings to you not a whit less than my infancy did. . . .

His love of his wife—"a jovial couple" they styled themselves—and children, warm and human as it was, went hand in hand with a singularly childlike piety, which in 1878 was put to a rude test by the loss of his mate. He could write to Mr. Waters:

I am so very happy for her sake that I am wonderfully upheld and comforted, and I can always soothe myself by going to her grave. . . . I was not unhappy, as the most childlike trust and love shone through [her delirium] and one could see that her mind was stayed on God, and was therefore in perfect peace.

And his personal sufferings he bore with a like religious fortitude. "I try to make it a willing offering," he said simply of the agony he suffered while the surgeons removed the dead bone from his leg. He returned home a hopeless cripple; but the old spirit lived in him, and on his crutches he would challenge all wooden-legged comers to a trial of speed. The offer of the mastership of the college founded to commemorate his father he received at first with a loud guffaw; that he with his lucky third, and with such a career behind him, should blossom at last into a don struck him as humorous; but when it was pressed upon him from every side he threw himself into the work with all his wonted energy. Behold him, therefore, in his old age, careering along the towpath on his hand tricycle, breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the vices of luckless freshers labouring at the oar. But it was not with rowing form alone that the Master concerned himself.

Many Selwyn men recall with gratitude and affection those talks over a pipe which ended so often in the pouring out of religious difficulties, after which the Bishop took the place of the Master, and the undergraduate knelt with him in prayer and received his episcopal blessing.

It is only last year that he was compelled, by the failure of his health, to resign. They took him to Pau, and did for him what might be done to prolong life. On the night of February 12 he said: "I think I am dying." Then: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with us all evermore." His mind wandered; he thought himself on ship-board. "Call me at one bell," he said. But at one bell he slept too sound.

Mr. How has written this memoir as such memoirs should be written: briefly, and with a proper sense of distinction between the things that should be remembered and those other things which, without loss, may be forgotten. To read his life is to love this boy. He was the ideal of a type peculiar to the Church of England among the religious societies of the world.

An Old Manor House.

Annals of an Old Manor House; Sutton Place, Guildford.
By Frederic Harrison. Abridged Edition. (Macmillan.)

"To have the feelings of gentility it is not necessary to have been born gentle," said Charles Lamb. To have the feeling of ownership in a noble old mansion it is only necessary to have lived in it. Indeed, the most casual tourist does not walk through the halls of a great house with that sense of being a stranger and a visitor which he has when he pushes the electric knob of a new Brixton villa. In the big, uncertain past there is room for much speculation, and we may take the benefit of a thousand doubts. Rank and rent-rolls and a noble pleasure—who knows how narrowly we have missed them? Mr. Harrison has lived much at Sutton Place, which has long been occupied by members of his family. Of the Westons, the original line of owners, he says: "These men and women were nothing to me or to mine, no more than any other names in the history of those days; their house and their pictures and their escutcheons do not belong to mine or to me, who am but a passing visitor among them. But I came to love the old place, the very brickwork and the weeds and the lichens which have clung round the mouldings, the swallows twittering round the tiles, and the deep glow of the painted glass. So, bit by bit, my notes grew into a connected account of the house and its vicissitudes." What Mr. Harrison feels at Sutton the reader may feel in his armchair. Here is an antidote to the morning paper. Here the shadow moves on the dial slowly, slowly; and generations come and go very quietly, and the brave old house preserves its Tudor stillness unharmed. "Many a green isle needs must be!"—and Sutton Place is one of those pieces of England which every storm has agreed to spare.

Built in the reign of Henry VIII., whom an old writer calls "the onlie phoenix of his time for fine and curious masonrie," Sutton Place is the contemporary of Hampton Court; of Christ Church, Oxford; of Grimsthorp, in Lincolnshire; of Kenninghall, in Norfolk; and of Layer Marney Towers, in Essex. Its builder and first owner, Sir Richard Weston, was the servant of Wolsey and the King, and he escaped being crushed between them. The wayward lightnings of Henry's anger played harmlessly round Sir Richard's head, though his son and heir was executed on Tower Hill, and his brother, the prior of a monastic house, died of grief at the Dissolution. An immunity not so hard to explain has attended the home that Sir Richard built. "No Elizabethan architect has added a classical porch; no Jacobean magnate has thrown out a ponderous wing with fantastic gables and profusion of scrolls; no Georgian squire has turned it into a miniature Blenheim, or consulted his comfort by adding a square barrack. Sir Richard Weston, were he to return from his long sleep with his descendants in Trinity Church at Guildford, would find his way to the doorway in the court, and would recognise his home, worn and dimmed a little in these 380 years, but, it may be, mellowed by time into a peculiar charm, softened by the mosses and the lichens on the cornices, and the wallflowers and the ferns which nestle beneath the traceries of the bays." This happy preservation is due to the fact that Sutton was the home of a Catholic family, whose sons were not only excluded from public life and its emoluments, but were mulcted in heavy fines under oppressive laws. Their purses were never full enough to enable them to indulge in architectural freaks.

The house, as built between 1520 and 1530, consisted of a great quadrangle, enclosing a space 81 ft. on each side, and fronted by a great arched gateway with a tower rising above it and flanked with two hexagonal turrets. This gateway, and the north wing to which it belonged, were removed in 1782, by no means to the hurt of the mansion as a residence. The glory of the house is still its quadrange, with its central building and two wings. Essentially English and Tudor in their main effect, the walls are delightful for their frieze-like, terra-cotta ornament. This is used, Mr. Harrison explains, in precisely the same way as stone is used to dress a brick building. The mullions of the windows, the dripstones, string-courses, turrets, arches, parapets, and groins are all decked in this delicate medium; and such has been the durability of the ornament that, "after 380 years of exposure, the mouldings remain almost as perfect as when they were cast." This use of terra-cotta seems to have been confined to a short interlude in our architectural history, but in that interlude it was gracefully applied to Hampton Court, Layer Marney, and East Barsham, as well as to Sutton. Mr. Harrison thinks that Henry the Eighth's Italian architect, Girolamo da Trevizi, who is said to have introduced terra-cotta work, and to have personally applied it to Layer Marney, may have superintended the work at Sutton. What seems certain is that the house was erected by English builders who were in sympathy with the Italian movement, and had the wit to see that the old substance and the new embroidery could be married.

Time has given to the brickwork and terra-cotta of Sutton a hundred tints, "varied by the grays and greens of lichens, mosses, and wall-flowers, so that the whole presents an extraordinary assemblage of warm and harmonious hues." Nowhere, perhaps, in England is there such a harmonious contradiction between the operations of Time, which has preserved forms in the sharpest outline, while adding the tones proper to age and decay. Only a part of the house is now inhabited. "Huge stacks of chimneys tower up, but are never warmed by a fire; the chapel and the chapel-bell are gone; the amorini still dance and sport, but under mosses and weeds; decaying casements creak in the wind, and ivy encumbers the arabesques upon many an empty mullion."

The surroundings of the house are worthy of its interior peace. We invite the reader to enjoy Mr. Harrison's description of the little world of Sutton. A more graceful passage of its kind we do not wish to have at our elbow.

The gently-gliding circles of the Wey, where it issues through the gate in the chalk at Guildford, wind round the House in long enfolding reaches, which on three sides alike shut it off from the neighbouring country. The water meadows stretch for miles from the foot of the wooded bank on which the house is placed. Far beyond them, on the ridge between Guildford and Farnham, lies the ancient track of the pilgrims from the west to the shrine of St. Thomas at Canterbury. Above Guildford the Chapel of St. Catherine and the Chapel of St. Martha crown the Western and the Eastern hills. Through the gap where the Saxons bridged the Wey at Guildford the glades of Surrey reach in broken vistas to the weald. To the east, head away in the distance, in sweeps of woodland and copse, the downs of Effingham, and Clandon, and Horsley. Broad open upland is all around, nor has our nineteenth century as yet broken the spell. One may watch the brickwork and the mouldings that the old knight raised in the heyday of the merry king without disturbance from the world or an echo of busy life. One listens to the cooing of the wood-pigeon in the shady masses of the limes; one may watch the kingfisher skim the unruffled bosom of the Wey, and the heron at work in the shallows. And in the evening there comes across the warren the murmur of the tumbling bays—the invention that the younger Sir Richard brought out of Brabant—and the beat of the water-wheel of the mill, which is the wheel recorded by the Conqueror in his Domesday.

Long may it be before the last window of Sutton is darkened. We are glad that this story, written first in 1879, is reissued in a form which brings it within the reach of many to whom the large edition, with its costly illustrations, was forbidden.

Other New Books.

ESSAYS ON SUBJECTS CONNECTED WITH THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND. BY THE LATE S. R. MAITLAND, D.D.

Dr. Maitland was one of the first modern writers who attempted to revise the traditional English Protestant conception of the Middle Ages. His "Dark Ages" is antiquated in the light of modern scholarship, but it is admirably written, and was certainly successful in its attempt to show that the "Middle" Ages were not "Dark," but that throughout them there was a catena of genuine learning, for which the chief credit lies with the great Benedictine monasteries. It was an illuminating and, literally, an epoch-making book, and is thoroughly worthy of re-reading to-day. We do not feel quite sure that the same can be said of the companion volume of essays on the Reformation which Mr. Hutton has been at the pains to reprint. Here Maitland is destructive in his aim, and the prejudices are on his own side. The object of the book is to depreciate the Reformation by belittling the Reformers. The character of the essays is fairly to be gathered from their titles: "Puritan Veracity," "Puritan Style," "The Puritan Palinodie," "The Ribalds," and so forth. We do not think that it is well, in the interests of a sane conception of history in general, and of ecclesiastical history in particular, to revive obsolete controversy of this type. Even Mr. Hutton seems a little ashamed of himself for so doing. His brief introduction is in part devoted to pointing out the caution with which Maitland's conclusions must needs be received—that, for instance, his defence of Bishop Bonner and his attack on the veracity of Foxe, the Martyrologist, are alike overdone. The rest of it is devoted to showing that the significance of the Reformation in the religious life of England was a far greater one than the sort of people who are likely to welcome Maitland's book will be willing to admit. DANCING IN ALL AGES.

BY EDWARD SCOTT.

An adequate history of the dance would be a valuable contribution to anthropology. For such a work there is abundant, if scattered, material. It should discuss the origin of the dance in the festival processions and sacrifices of primitive man, its relation to religious cult, to love-making and to the beginnings of literature, its mimetic character, and its gradual evolution into the drama. The survivals of folk-dance in modern times, and a comparative study of the various types of dance preserved by the different branches of the European stock, would afford interesting chapters; while the adaptation of such primitive types in the more sophisticated performances of the salon and the ballet should not be neglected. In the meantime, Mr. Scott's Dancing in All Ages is a very trivial compilation, in spite of his claim, "in addition to literary research, to have made a conscientious study of the art in theory and practice." He confesses that "to the dances of barbarous countries and primitive tribes my attention has not here been given." Unfortunately these are the key of the whole matter, and any account, for instance, of the Greek and Roman dance which does not rest upon these is likely to become mere gossip. This is just what Mr. Scott's book is, and we fear that the literary research of which he speaks is mainly of the nature of unintelligent borrowing from second-hand sources. He writes of "Scheigel" for "Schegel" and "Balsac" for "Balzac" and "Beotia" for "Bœotia" and "Tyson" for "Lysons" and "Bathyllus" for "Bathyllus." He thinks that Roscius was a pantomime dancer, and that the Palilia was a festival of Pallas. His knowledge of such English folk-dances as the "morris dance" and the "sword-dance" is meagre in the extreme. Even his account of the modern society dances is scrappy and anecdotal. In every respect his volume is far inferior to that by Mrs. Lily Grove and others, itself little more than a mere sketch, in the "Badminton" Library. (Sonnenschein.)

SOME TEXTUAL NOTES ON THE TRAGÉDIE OF ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA. BY A. E. THISELTON.

The textual criticism of Shakespeare has almost reached its term. Since the days of Theobald and Warburton the stream of emendations and restorations of the folio and quarto texts has been a perennial one, and there is probably little left to be guessed which has not already been recorded in the copious apparatus criticus of the Cambridge edition. Should, however, that monumental work ever come to require a second revision, the editors might perhaps find some pickings in Mr. Thielton's modest pamphlet. Mr. Thielton is a "conservative" critic, and in one or two cases we think that he makes out a fair case for readings of the First Folio which have been somewhat too hastily discarded. At the same time, his reverence for the Folio, which extends to its capitals and its punctuation, is surely overdone, and some of the explanations to which he has recourse in the endeavour to avoid emendation of so much as a comma or an apostrophe are singularly far-fetched and unconvincing. The Folio has

"but all the charmes of Loue,
Salt Cleopatra soften thy wand lip.

The least emendation is Steevens's "wan'd lip"; but Mr. Thielton will have none of it. He writes, "Shakespeare here converts the substantive 'wand' into an adjective, qualifying Cleopatra's lip, which is compared to a wand (1) owing to its form which the act of kissing will soften or bend, and (2) because it is an instrument of enchantment." The first qualification of the textual critic is a flair for the possible in language, and we are not sure that Mr. Thielton has this flair. Of the famous cruz,

Her gentlewomen, like the Nereides,
So many mermaids, tended her i' the eyes,
And made their bends adornings, he says; "They adorned the glances of Cleopatra's eyes by the spectacle of their beauty and grace." This is manifestly absurd on the face of it. An "eye" or a "glance" cannot in any sense be said to be "adorned" by that which it regards. (Clement S. Palmer.)

Fiction.

The Orange Girl. By Sir Walter Besant.
(Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

It was the secret glory of Mr. Riach, the journalist-hero of Mr. J. M. Barrie's When a Man's Single, that he had encouraged Messrs. Besant and Rice, in print, with the words: "We have read The Chaplain of the Fleet without fatigue." For ourselves, we are inclined to use the same phrase, though by no means in the same spirit of patronage, in regard to The Orange Girl. There are books which must be read, books which refuse to be read, and books which may be read; and the last are divided into two classes, labelled respectively "with fatigue" and "without fatigue." To assign a novel to the latter class is to praise it; certainly no scorn is implied. And, indeed, we should wish to praise Sir Walter's latest essay in historical fiction. It is better than some of his recent work. It is dignified, scholarly, amiable, well-written, well-arranged, and tremendously documenté. Probably no other writer could give such exact and complete pictures of eighteenth-century London as appear again and again in this book. The lore of the thing is prodigious, and handled with genuine manipulative skill. Newgate, King's Bench Prison, pleasure-gardens, Soho "assembly," night-den, theatre, criminal court, merchant's office, attorney's lair—the completeness of his knowledge embraces them all. Of course, he has performed these feats of an antiquarian fancy before, but—so far as our knowledge extends—never with more adroitness and efficacy than here. The only fault we have to find with the rich and variegated local colour is that Sir Walter has a too emphatic preference for prison-life and criminal trials. There are three important trials, and scores of pages of prison-life. It is in this connexion—and only in this connexion—that Sir Walter loses sometimes his sense of proportion and comes near to writing a treatise.

It is true that the law of the land gives to every prisoner a groat—fourpence a day—to be paid by the detaining creditor—yet the groat is not always paid, and can only be obtained, if the creditor refuses it, by legal steps, which a man destitute of money cannot take. What attorney will take up the case of a man without a farthing? If the debtor wins his case, how is he to pay the attorney any costs out of fourpence a day? If he wishes to plead in forma pauperis, the law allows the warder to charge six shillings and eightpence for leave to go to the Court, and half-a-crown for the turnkey to take him there; what prisoner on the poor side can pay these fees? So that when a prisoner is really poor he cannot get his groats at all, for the creditor will not pay them unless he is obliged. Again, there are other ways of evading the law. If a debtor surrenders in June. . . .

The interest—always a mild and equable interest—resides rather in the scenes taken individually than in the "story." The plot follows an accepted convention, employing conventional figures and conventional devices. The villains are truly villainous: Probus, the attorney, and Merriew, the "thief-taker," equal in turpitude, the most notorious rascals in history. The heroine, who from selling oranges in Drury-lane rose to refuse the hand of a peer, has that incredible purity and that amazing altruism which can exist only under this particular artistic convention. The hero is a good fellow, who suffers and enjoys through no fault or effort of his own, being, in fact, somewhat simple and mediocre. But these matters are quite usual in the historical novel, and have always been so. The convention being accepted, it may be fairly urged against the strength of the plot that there is no vital connexion of sentiment between the heroine and any other personage in the book. One would have thought that a "powerful love-interest" was essential; Sir Walter almost entirely dispenses with it; nor does he seem to put anything in its place.

As we have said, however, the interest depends not on the story. You must look elsewhere for the book's good qualities. And it has good qualities, and nearly every good quality except that which keeps you up at night.

Quinford. By Arthur H. Holmes.
(Unicorn Press. 6s.)

MR. HOLMES has set himself, in this first book, to an enterprise worthy of the author of What Maisie Knew and The Awkward Age: to recount the loves of four ordinary people, dwelling apart in a village, as they reflected themselves in the mind of one of them, an unmarried woman of forty. We have no desire to rebuke him for audacity; we respect his courage; and if we are unable to congratulate him upon success, that is, at least in part, for a reason more or less accidental. The pen of every good writer of English prose holds in solution a certain bulk of Shakespeare, Defoe, and the Bible: no one resents that. But Mr. Holmes's is clogged with Mr. Henry James and Mr. George Meredith. Let us make that good. Miss Rose reflects, in the midst of a conversation, the space of one page. After which—

A wonderful strength came to her.
Facing him firmly, she held out her hand, her eyes splendidly lighted.
"Yes," she said with emphasis, "I leave it to you."
She knew it was the strongest thing she had ever done.

Everyone is familiar with that wonderful game of Mr. James by which the conclusion of a finely analytic passage is enclaved by some banal phrase that, in its setting, jams conviction tight. And here a moment's random search finds an example of the other:

The intimation was touched, so it seemed, with the joy of life, with the bounding gaiety of days innocently riotous: she found in it the suggestion of those sweets of existence which, in one shape or another, lie back in the consciousness or plead in the devotions of all men, taking from the great external elements an essence which revivifies and adorns the internal, finding the beauty of earth in the excellence of its gifts to the individual—the sunny, alluring, impassioning gifts which appeal to the human without offending the divine. And so finding she was given the thing discovered: possession was earned by mere sight.

Now, what with the critical pre-occupation inevitable in the case of a writer who fashions his work so obviously upon living models, and the comparison that upon every page he seems directly to challenge, it is extremely difficult to submit oneself to illusion, or to assay the work otherwise than by comparison; which, it must be confessed, is in Mr. Holmes's regard very odious. The ideal critic would be an intelligent and educated person unacquainted with the work of either master; and such a person it would not be easy to find. In his default, we are able to say of Mr. Holmes only that he is a writer of insight and industry; and that if he can enlarge himself from the limitations of his otherwise commendable idolatry, he may in the future be expected to give us something that will be read—but tremendously read (as Mr. James might say).

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

OUR LADY OF DARKNESS.

BY BERNARD CAPES.

Another story of the French Revolution, by the author of The Adventures of the Comte de la Mustte. Mr. Capes's new hero is a young English aristocrat imbued with the teachings of Tom Paine and the Encyclopædists. He visits France, meets an extraordinary girl, dislikes her, misunderstands her, loves her, and on the scaffold loses her. (Blackwood. 6s.)

THE VIOLET FLAME.

BY FRED. T. JANE.

A clever scientific-miraculous story by the author of His Lordship, The Passen, and Wo. "Mirzarbeau did not let the grass grow under his feet; three days after that interview with Miss Baker, the whole of London was placarded with his pretensions. The posters were, at any rate, masterpieces of simplicity: 'I, Fleuris Mirzarbeau, am the Man called The Beast, in the Book of Revelation. I shall rule the World. It was my Hand that destroyed Waterloo Station; and thus will I destroy all the Earth unless my Power is recognised.' This is but the beginning of wonders, all of which are laid in London. (Ward, Lock & Co. 3s. 6d.)

THE SHADOW ON THE MANSE. BY CAMPBELL RAE-BROWN.

This novel, by the author of The Loveliest Woman in London and other novels, is a story of religion and the stage. The two elements meet when the new minister and the new laird—old schoolfellows—find themselves neighbours. This is how an old gardener warns the Rev. Basil Hamilton against Tom Featherstone: "Never say a word, man, but he's gat mair than a dizen—a hale dizen, min' ye—o' real livin' play-actors coming by the morn's first steamer, a' straight red-het fra London, and the hauf o' them weemin—weemin! Dae ye hear that?" (Greening. 6s.)

AGAINST THE TIDES OF FATE. BY JOHN ARTHUR BARRY.

Contains thirteen stories, by the author of Steve Brown's Bunyip. It is a pity that the title-page and cover do not indicate this fact. Most of the stories are of the sea and Australian life. (Duckworth. 3s. 6d.)

THE BOND OF BLACK.

BY WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

"Although the police were, by these revelations of Muriel's, made aware of the existence of Satanism in London, the suicide of their head made it unnecessary for any details of the cultus diabolicus to be given to the public through the medium of the sensational Press." But the sensational novel had its mission to perform: hence these lurid pages by the author of If Sinners Entice Thee. (F. V. White & Co. 6s.)

SIR SERGEANT.

BY W. L. WATSON.

We wonder how many romances of the '45 are published per annum. To do Mr. Watson justice his narrative is one of adventures that "ensued upon the '45." It is a gallant story. A good passage is the description of a keen fencing-bout between Lord Balmeath and his daughter, Lady Christine. (Blackwood. 6s.)

A NEW DIVINITY.

BY "CHOLA."

Ten slight stories of Indian life. The first, which gives the title to the book, tells how a very objectionable English member of the Indian Civil Service was thrown from his horse and killed, and thereupon converted by the natives into a deity and placated with choice cigars. Of one of the other stories the author says that it was, when it first appeared, "much mutilated to fit the editor's Procrustean bed." (Longmans. 2s. 6d.)

LOVE'S DEPTHS.

BY GEORGES OHNET.

A translation, by Mr. Fred. Rothwell, of a typical "Ohnet." All the ingredients are here, mixed with the old skill. The villainess-in-chief, Mme. Florence Lefrançois, is a miracle of turpitude. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

THE LITTLE NOVICE.

BY ALIX KING.

A story of two English girls educated in a French convent. Muriel decides to be a nun, but, meeting a medical student, changes her plans and becomes a lady doctor. Frustrated love follows, but the end is bliss. Incidentally a doctor is called a "disciple of Æsculapius," and hell "a place whose climate is not considered particularly salubrious." (Cassell. 6s.)

SUCH IS THE LAW.

BY MARIE M. SADLEIR.

A melodramatic mixture. Lavender Garland loves Sidney Weston, a drunkard. Few could look at her sweet face, or meet her deep, luminous eyes, without a pull at their heartstrings. Weston dies, and Lavender suffers until Sir Spencer Percival leads her to the altar on his immaculate arm. After the wedding the glory of the setting sun glistened on her rippling hair and shone on her dewy eyes till he tenderly kissed the tears away. (Greening. 6s.)

THE DESIRE OF MAN.

BY L. T. MEADE.

Mrs. Meade calls her new story an "impossibility," and we are disposed to agree with her. Mr. Rochester, aged seventy-five, is transformed, through the occult skill of Dr. Jellybrand, to a young man of full vigour and an incapacity to die. This regeneration is transmitted to him by his grand-daughter Eugenia, who holds his hands and looks intense. The story then begins, and at the end Mr. Rochester expresses himself ready for death. (Digby Long & Co. 6s.)

FURZE BLOOM.

BY S. BARING-GOULD.

Hitherto all the stories in "The Novelist," Messrs. Methuen's sixpenny series of new fiction, have been long. The present book is, however, a collection of twelve tales of the Western Moors, by a writer who knows his subject as well as anyone. "Genefer," "A Can of Whortles," "Anthony Blight," "Ruth Tregoddeck," "Polly Porter"—these are some of the titles. (Methuen. 6d.)

Express Literature.

THOSE persons who wondered how the newspaper correspondents who were gathered together at Rennes spent their time after the hearings were done—hearings that began at six in the morning and were over before ordinary business has made a start—will find in this book a partial solution. Mr. Steevens, at any rate, was occupied as historian. His Daily Mail article once out of the way, he was at liberty to cast the drama upon which he was a privileged spectator into narrative form. The result lies before us,* a notable example of that rapid modern publishing which is merely an extension of journalism.

To review Mr. Steevens's work in the ordinary way is impossible, because no reviewer has any exact knowledge on the subject. It is one of the cases where the critic confesses at once, and without shame, that the author is his superior in information. Mr. Steevens was at Rennes; we were not: hence we can but say that his book is workmanlike in arrangement, incisively written, and very readable. Instead, therefore, of detailed criticism we extract descriptions of Dreyfus, Mercier, and Picquart, which show how capably Mr. Steevens comes to his work as special correspondent:

ALFRED DREYFUS.

There came in a little old man—an old, old man of thirty-nine. A small-statured, thick-set old man in the black uniform of the artillery; over the red collar his hair was gone white as silver, and on the temples and at the back of the crown he was bald. As he turned to face the judges there was a glimpse of a face both burned and pale—a rather broad, large-featured face with a thrusting jaw and chin. It was not Jewish in expression until you saw it in profile. . . .

He walked up two steps to his seat with a gait full of resolve, yet heavy, constrained, mechanical—such a gait as an Egyptian mummy might walk with if it came to life in its swathing grave-clothes. He saluted the President with a white-gloved hand, took off his képi, sat down. An officer of gendarmes followed and sat down behind him. The Registrar, rising from beside the prosecuting officer, read out the general order constituting the court; then the white moustache and imperial twitched as the President, in a small voice, put a question to the prisoner. Another sudden stillness: then came the voice of Dreyfus. No one heard what it said—thin, sapless, split, it was such as might rustle from the lips of a corpse.

What he had said was, "Alfred Dreyfus; Captain of Artillery; thirty-nine years." With these three common phrases he broke the silence of four years and a half. Nothing could be more formal, and yet here in the first five minutes of the trial was summed up the whole incredibly romantic history. Alfred Dreyfus—five years ago nobody knew there was such a name in the world; now the leading comic singer of Paris, who was born with it, has changed it because it is too embarrassingly famous. Captain of Artillery—and generals who have led armies in the presence of the enemy have lost their commands because of him. Thirty-nine years—and here were men who were known before he was born staking their ripe reputations for or against him. Sitting within ten yards of him were Casimir-Perier, the only living ex-Chief of the State in which he was a simple unit; Mercier, Billot, Cavaignac, Zurlinden, Chanoine—five successive heads, and half a dozen generals besides, of the army in which he was an unregarded subordinate; Hanotaux, the Minister who for years has conducted foreign relations in which he could never have dreamed of figuring—all there because he was. Novelists like Prévost and Mirbeau, essayists like Maurice Barrès, philosophers like Max Nordau, French journalists like Arthur Meyer and Cornély, foreign journalists who linked the whole world together—they had all come to see him. There were men like Picquart and Lebrun-Renault, nobodies when last he knew and spoke with them—now famous in two continents just because they had known and spoken with him. Most dramatic of all, there was a little, close-veiled woman in black—Madame Henry—a woman he had never seen, widow of a man whom he never knew, yet who had risen to celebrity and fallen to an infamous death because of him.

What did he think of such a miracle, such an irony? To all appearances he did not think of it at all. He sat rigid and upright, hugging his chair close with back and legs and feet, his hands folded to the képi on his knees.

COLONEL PICQUART.

His demeanour was not at all conciliatory. He approached with absolute calm on a face that bears no sign of passion either for good or evil: he looks—and looks as if he knows he looks—the embodiment of pure reason. He settled himself very carefully and lengthily on the witness's chair, got his shoulder-blades comfortably into the back, crossed his leg over his knee, and pulled down his trousers over his boots. Then he poured out a glass of water and laid both hands firmly on the table before him. He suggested that, while far from wishing to swagger, he knew he was master of the situation. When he began to speak there was neither the ease of conversation nor the rhythm of declamation. You remembered that he had been a professor at the École de Guerre. It was a lecture, pure and simple; and the first word was as distinct and clear cut as the last. His whole demeanour said, "Now, gentlemen, I must ask you to listen to me. I shall take some time; but, if you will only listen, you have now the chance of your lives to understand the Dreyfus case."

And then, without hesitation or confusion, Colonel Picquart explained the Dreyfus case for seven hours and a half. It was a masterpiece of reasoning—the intellectual triumph of the trial. I should strongly advise the French War Office to make its peace with Colonel Picquart, for he has a better head than all the generals put together.

GENERAL MERCIER.

Mercier's personality strikes the note of the whole Dreyfus case. Looking at his back as he gave evidence—tall, straight, and slim—you could have called him soldierly and suspected him stupid. On his face and neck the bronzed skin hangs loosely. There is neither depth of cranium nor height of forehead to hold a brain in. The eyes are slits with heavy-curtained lids and bags beneath them that turn the drooping cheeks into caverns. A little moustache and beard frame thin lips that might be evil, sensuous, humorous, but could never be human. If you look at his head you think him a vulture; if at his face you call him a mummy. He speaks in a low, passionless monotone; his gestures are calculated to follow his words instead of proceeding, as a Frenchman's should, along with them, on the same impulse. When he was interrupted by Casimir-Perier he persisted in his assertions with the dogged mumble of a schoolboy detected in a lie. As he sat and strove to wind the toils of treason round the prisoner he seemed as unmoved by hate as by pity; he accused him dully, as if repeating a lesson. Cold, deliberate, tortuous, thorough yet ineffective, verbose but not candid, battling bravely with native stupidity, truly believing himself to be doing God's work, fearless of responsibility, untouched by anger or pity, fear or hope either for others or for himself—General Mercier was the very type and mirror of a Jesuit Grand Inquisitor.

When the time comes—if ever it does come—for the trial of Dreyfus's oppressors and the real traitor, we hope that Mr. Steevens may again be present. We need his portrait of Esterhazy.

The Ineligible "Elegy."

LAST week, in a little sketch called "The Reading Class," I rather casually suggested that Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" ought to be excluded from school reading-books. I propose now to show literary reason for this exclusion. It will be admitted that this beautiful poem is to be found in almost every school Reader, that, in fact, it has been selected as a kind of elocutionary whetstone for the British schoolboy. It is reasonable, therefore, to suppose that it has had, and is having, a great influence in the formation of a taste for poetry. And a taste for poetry is one of the supreme savours of life!

Now, the natural boy hates poetry. He may come to like brave rhymes and jingling metres, but, as a rule, he likes in verse only what he likes better in prose. If his taste for poetry is to grow, it must be tenderly watered; and the custom is to water it with Gray's "Elegy."

It is a bad choice. I do not wish to lay too much stress on the structural difficulties of the "Elegy," or on those feats of misunderstanding which boys will bring to almost any poem put before them; but certainly, if there is a poem which is strewn with pitfalls, and which opens the doors of the Vague to the youthful mind, it is the "Elegy." My proposition last week that "to boys the whole poem is unreal," has brought me a letter from an old school friend, who languished in the same arid pastures of literature as myself. In it he says: "As to Gray's 'Elegy,' I am sure you are right. I remember how I used to grind through it without one word of explanation when I was a little fellow of ten years of age [observe, ten!]: each line went by itself, and one consequence was that the thing in the piece that impressed me most was the reference to

The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear.

I had had my neck nearly wrung off in those days for once saying that a noun 'governed' something, and I was not the boy to risk a further twisting by asking if it was the Polar Bear that was meant; but there was a magnificent remoteness in the dwelling of this creature that always pleased me, and it was not till later that I discovered what the verse really meant."

Is not this pathetic? Could a boy's inability to grapple with poetic forms and ideas be better illustrated? Yet I knew a boy of sixteen, who led our Sunday evening hymns, to whom the words conveyed the notion that Paradise was a hard old worldling who did not—and would not—crave for rest.

O Paradise! O Paradise!
Who doth not crave for rest?

It is of small use to say that the teacher of a reading class ought to explain difficult points. If he began to explain Gray's "Elegy" he would never be done. The object of a reading class is to teach reading. If the reading matter provided is beyond the boys' grasp, they cannot deliver it properly; while if the teacher is to clear the way with explanations, the main end will hardly be gained. You don't exercise colts on stony ground, and to throw stumbling-blocks of sense in the way of a boy whose tongue you are training seems rather inept. It is doubtful, moreover, whether the most capable reading master could, with hammering talk of Subject, Predicate, Clause, Connexion, and what not, or by any more humane process, get his boys to understand some of the verses in the "Elegy." Let those who have suffered—and most of us are in this boat—recall their pangs of conscious dullness when they grappled with the three-stanza sentence:

Th' applause of list'ning senates to command,
The threats of pain and ruin to despise,
To scatter plenty o'er a smiling land,
And read their history in a nation's eyes

Their lot forbade: nor circumscribed alone
Their growing virtues, but their crimes confined;
Forbad to wade through slaughter to a throne,
And shut the gates of mercy on mankind;

The struggling pangs of conscious truth to hide,
To quench the blushes of ingenuous shame,
Or heap the shrine of Luxury and Pride
With incense kindled at the Muse's flame.

To carry boys over the Pons Asinorum is child's play compared with making them understand the "Elegy." My friend's vision of a submarine bear might, no doubt, have been dissipated by his teacher in a trice; although, when you think of it, it seems scarcely just to expect any mortal teacher to divine that such an idea had occurred to any mortal boy. But these verbal pitfalls may pass; there are higher misunderstandings and disabilities. I remember that an excellent reading master once drilled us for a quarter of an hour in the delivery of Gray's line—

The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

He said, and I am very sure he was right, that we failed to express the sadness and irony of the contrast between the path and its goal. I have often thought that as the years go by and go by I shall become more capable of delivering that line as my master wished me to deliver it in 1879. It is one of those lines which one learns to speak in the Reading-class of Life. I believe that this master failed to see that the line was beyond our powers, because, in such a special sense, it was beyond our experience. For us the paths of glory led to the cricket field, to B—— Common, and to the clean, wide ice on H—— Dam.

Yet the real case against the "Elegy" has still to be stated. It is not the presence of isolated, difficult lines which makes Gray's poem the most unsuitable in the language to put before boys. It is the whole mind of the "Elegy," which is a concentrated account of a mood impossible to the young. The poem touches a boy nowhere. It gives him no cue; there is no beckoning familiar thing to hearten and invite, no fulcrum by which a healthy lad can lift the deadweight of a man's world-weariness.

It may be said that the very difficulty of the "Elegy" is good to stretch a boy's mind. Not so, for the wedge principle is wanting. Difficulties are good where the boy recognises something as his own. Any one of Shakespeare's plays contains lines and moods as far from a boy's experience as the "Elegy." But the difference is vital. In the play (I am thinking particularly of "Julius Cæsar," through which we were once taken in admirable style and to our life-long advantage) the parts which are within a boy's grasp explain, or at the least humanise, the parts which are beyond his grasp. The boy builds on the ground he can occupy, and the rest is insensibly laid out in building plots in his mind. As life goes on, he takes up this ground, and the play goes with him, and becomes a running commentary on life. Any piece of literature which takes large account of life is pretty safe provender for boys. They find their own, and, recognising that the whole is organic and true, they are willing to know in part and prophesy in part. But the "Elegy"—what root has it in boyhood? What boy ever believed in the "hoary-headed swain" or the "forefathers of the hamlet"? As for the youth who gave to Misery all he had, a tear, and gained from Heaven, 'twas all he wish'd, a friend, no schoolboy ever understood that transaction. And this poem, which boys cannot understand, and masters cannot hope to explain, is our accepted introduction to Poetry. That is where the mischief lies. The "Elegy" is torn to tatters, and Poetry is not recommended. Nor is the hardship a mere school-days' affair, as the grown man learns when he is prompted to turn to the "Elegy"—and finds, not a poem, but a phonograph.

Beauchamp's Case.

WHAT I saw was this: a man in clerical dress sprawling on the ale-house bench, drinking and laughing with the village yokels. The entire abandon of his manner was amazing: he was of them; his was the loudest guffaw. Shepherd and flock were on common ground—the communism of the bench outside the village ale-house.

Later, over a cup of tea, I mentioned the incident to my sister, at whose house I was staying. She shook her head (the little grey curls on either side twiddled against each other), and pressed the tomato sandwiches on me.

"But the ale-house incident!" I persisted. "Is it not strange that a parson should—er—care to hobnob with the village yokels?"

"Ah! Mr. Beauchamp has odd habits."

"Beauchamp!" I echoed, remembering that there had been something familiar in my glimpse of that long figure sprawling on the ale-house bench. "Harry Beauchamp do you mean?"

She nodded. "Did you know him?"

"As one of the most brilliant men I have ever known. He was not a particularly good scholar, but he had remarkable gifts of understanding and intuition. He seemed to know things by a sixth sense, to understand them, to be of them and yet above them."

"Like Shakespeare!" interposed my hostess, a satirical gleam in her eye.

"Like Shakespeare!" I repeated, and I meant it. "But his were awful gifts. He gained his experience too quickly. We said of him that at thirty he would have exhausted life—and then—"

She looked curiously at me. "Then is now! Come tomorrow morning and hear him preach."

The next day was Sunday. We walked over the fields to his church. On the way we discussed Harry Beauchamp. He had descended upon the parish three years ago, with the effect of a captain of Dragoons on a girls' school. Churchgoing became popular; tea at the rectory developed into a function, and Beauchamp into a craze. Within six months he married a charming widow of good family, who read Spinoza, played Dvorák after breakfast, and talked of mediæval art. Her boudoir at the rectory was refurnished in modest imitation of Walter Pater's green drawing-room, and Mrs. Beauchamp was referred to in the county journal as "the most cultured and the most exquisitely dressed woman in East Anglia."

"The effect on Beauchamp," continued my sister, "was characteristic. With his extraordinary power of living a year in a week, he went through and emerged on the other side of the culture pose long before the green drawing-room was ready for use. A dog that's fed on dainties and lives in unnatural luxury will, you know, when he gets the chance, delight in gutter garbage. Beauchamp's descent, if I may call it descent, was more fastidious. He craved for the life of the natural man; the veneer and trappings of the artificial environment into which he had dropped—bored and irritated him. He sought his companions among men who knew about things at first hand—shepherds, labourers, sailors, and the like. He took to drinking beer, smoking a clay pipe, and using the dialect. He refused to go about with his wife because, he said, the swish of her silk skirts maddened him. She died when their child was born—luckily."

"And then?"

"Then he married the daughter of a 'looker'—that is, a man who looks after sheep. She can't read or write, and they live in a cottage with a brick floor, and a living-room that opens on to the street. But here is the church. His sermon may interest you."

Beauchamp's faithlessness to his caste had affected his appearance to the extent that he now allowed his hair and beard to grow as it listed. But his brain had not lost quality, nor his voice conviction. The way he declaimed the words, "I will arise and go to my father," as if, after long doubt and pain, the impulse had just seized him and he must away at once, thrilled the crowded, curious congregation. He read the lessons with remarkable elocutionary skill, and his part in the liturgy was spoken as if it was new to him that morning. I began to question if this was the man I had seen lolling on the ale-house bench the previous day, and my doubts deepened till he reached the penultimate stage of the sermon. It had been a powerful discourse, scholarly, allusive, clothed in fine nervous English, but at a certain point—well do I remember it, and the sensation it made—he broke, without effort, and apparently without premeditation, into the almost unintelligible dialect of the district. More: he dropped at once to the level of the least intelligent among his hearers. His allusions became broad and homely, his manner colloquial, his thought dull and slow. It was a most significant, a most bewildering exhibition.

"Do you ever see him? Does he ever call?" I asked my sister as we walked home.

She gave a slight, but expressive, shrug to her shoulders. "Last year, when an attractive woman was staying with me, he amazed us all by appearing in the drawing-room, one afternoon, clothed and in his right mind, but the gleam did not lighten him beyond the afternoon. That evening he was playing quoits with the hoppers."

"We can do nothing to help him, I suppose?"

"Nobody can help Harry Beauchamp. There is only one way for him—his own way. We can but watch and wonder."

The next day I met him in the village street, wearing a smock-frock, and carrying a thistle-spud. He touched his cap and gave me a gruff "Good morning."

My sister went abroad that autumn, and did not return till the late spring of the following year. I visited her in the month of June.

"Well, what about Beauchamp?" I asked. "Are his sermons entirely in the dialect now?"

"We see nothing of him. His wife still lives in the village."

"And he?"

"Still consistent. He's dropped a step—several steps—lower. I can show you his dwelling-place, if you like."

She took me to an upper window, and indicated a small, low building, looking like a cattle-shed, far away in the marsh lands—the famous grazing lands where cattle and innumerable sheep wander.

"Well?" I said.

"If you want Harry Beauchamp you must seek him there," she answered.

That evening I crossed the marshes and cautiously approached the shed. It was empty. But the interior showed signs—signs the merest, but signs—of habitation. A truss of not over-clean hay was strewn in the corner, and alongside were several roots, some nibbled, others half-eaten. There was no window, and the odour of the place was unpleasant.

Determined to have speech with the owner, even if I waited till his return, I crossed a brook that ran by the side of the shed and, crouching between a clump of bushes, waited. And while I waited, staring out over the wide plains, and wondering at the strange pranks Nature allows her children to play, I saw across a couple of fields something moving among a herd of cattle that were whisking their tails and rubbing their mild faces against the wire fencing. It was Beauchamp—on all-fours.

I did not speak to him.

Things Seen.

At the Worcester Festival.

SIDE by side lay the knight and his lady, their hands folded in prayer on their bosoms. Time had smoothed away the corners of the painted marble tomb; smoothed away their features, too, so that nothing remained but the placid, pious smile. A less gentle hand than Time's had dealt more ruthlessly with them. The dog against which their feet rested was headless; so was the eagle which served as a pillow. And one of the lady's feet, emerging from her stiffly folded skirt, was broken off.

The gaily-dressed, fashionable crowd began to pour into the Cathedral and fill the seats that stretched lengthwise down the nave and aisles from west to east. A Gothic arch watched over the eternal slumber of the peaceful pair. But chairs and seats were squeezed in at each end of the tomb, and along the sides, and soon hats gay with flowers and feathers nodded all around them, so that they might have been lying on a bed of bright blossoms.

Horatio Parker's "Horæ Novissimæ" thundered and triumphed down the nave and aisles. The voice of Albani floated in and out of the arches like a golden bird. It seemed to me that the knight and his lady listened reverently. Then the strains of Palestrina's "Stabat Mater," borne on the human voice, rose and fell with a pious wailing. I shut my eyes and my spirit flew back a few centuries. I seemed to be walking with the knight and his lady through dimly-lighted cloisters, listening to the doleful chanting of pale nuns and saints.

I opened my eyes. They still lay in their stone slumber, their hands folded in placid piety. Round about waved the gaudy hats. Someone had laid a red silk parasol, trimmed with chiffon and ribbons, and with a ripe tomato for a handle, down beside the lady; and on her body, resting just below the folded hands, was a pile of music books—Spohr's "Last Judgment," "Horæ Novissimæ," and a heavily-bound volume of Beethoven's Symphonies.

Assuredly I was back in the nineteenth century again.

Progress.

I HAD strolled across into the village churchyard to listen, for the organ was giving out "Abide with Me." The sun had set an hour ago, but here and there a broadening patch of light spread from the church windows. In one of the patches stood a figure, bent over a stick.

"I suppose we ought to be inside?" I said.

"Ay," he replied. And I saw that he was very, very old. His voice was high-pitched, and shaky.

"But we are pretty near," I argued.

"Might as well be ten mile away as jest outside," he said.

Inside rough rustic voices caught up the hymn. Just for something to say, I asked if Mr. Evershed were not the organist; for Mr. Evershed is everything in the village, from overseer to general provider of necessities.

"So they tell me," he said. Then, peering round at me, he added. "I used to play de organ there."

"It's a nice organ," I said.

"Ah, 't'warn't a finger-organ what I played," he said. "Two bar'ls it got. Parson come one marnin' and said: 'You got to grind de organ at church,' he said. I was skeered at first, but I soon come to it like. I played de organ twelve year and more."

"How many tunes did it play?"

"There was twelve toons, six on each bar'l. And I had to hold up one bar'l with one hand while I grind on de other, else it'd go slib-slib-slib like."

He illustrated it—for a moment—with his two hands and his stick; but ceased perforce and leaned again more heavily.

"What became of that organ?" I asked.

"Sold it—up—somewhere—in de shires," he piped, while his head bobbed with exhaustion from his pantomime. "Four or five pounds it fetched. I'd have liked to have had it in my room, jest to give me a toon now and then, when I turned the 'andle."

The hymn died down; and silence fell upon the churchyard.

"Ah, they can't sing bass to them finger-organs," said the old man, bowing over his stick. A few moments of silence, and then the soft fluster of a congregation released from prayer.

"I reckon they've finished blowin'," said the old man. And contempt squeaked in his voice as he plodded into the gloom.

R. L. S. at Anstruther.

A MEMORIAL-STONE was last week inserted in the wall of Cunzie House at Anstruther, where R. L. Stevenson lived during some of his early engineering days. The stone bears the following inscription:

Robert Louis Stevenson lived in this house in the summer of 1868.

Not one quick beat of your warm heart,
Nor thought that came to you apart,
Pleasure nor pity, love nor pain
Nor sorrow, has gone by in vain

From the breezy street corners of Edinburgh, and from the high windows of his father's house, the child Stevenson looked across the Forth, where the ships were "tacking for the Baltic," or returning from the Indies, "laden with parrots and tobacco," to Fife and its "little towns posted along the shore as thick as sedges, each with its bit of harbour, its old church or public building, its flavour of decayed prosperity and decaying fish."

And it was to Fife that he went with his father on his first journey "in the complete character of man, without the help of petticoats," hanging about with his hands in his pockets, the east wind humming in his teeth, and his head already full of ballads and the romance of history, whilst his father dealt severely with the guardians of the harbour lights. Then, as afterwards, Stevenson loved to turn back his mental clock two hundred years. For him Magus Muir, over which he drove with his father, was still a "desert place, quite unenclosed; in the midst the primate's carriage fleeing at the gallop; the assassins loose-reined in pursuit, Burley Balfour, pistol in hand, among the first. . . . The figure that always fixed my attention is that of Hackston, of Rathillet, sitting in the saddle with his cloak about his mouth," and taking "no hand in the deed because he had a private spite against the victim. . . . It is an old temptation with me to pluck away that cloak and see the face, to open that bosom and to read the heart. With incomplete romances about Hackston the drawers of my youth were lumbered."

This was but the first of many such journeys, and five years later Stevenson, now a lanky youth, was sent to Anstruther to glean engineering experience from the building of the breakwater.

What I gleaned I am sure I do not know; but, indeed, I had already my own private determination to be an author, . . . and in those days, though I haunted the breakwater by day, and even loved the place for the sake of the sunshine, the thrilling seaside air, the wash of waves on the sea face, the green glimmer of the divers' helmets far below, and the musical clinking of the masons, my one genuine preoccupation lay elsewhere, and my only industry was in the hours when I was not on duty. I lodged with a certain Bailie Brown, a carpenter by trade; and there, as soon as dinner was despatched, in a chamber scented with dry rose leaves, drew my chair to the table, and proceeded to pour forth literature at such a speed, and with such intimations of early death and immortality, as I now look back upon with wonder. Then it was that I wrote Voces Fidelium, a series of dramatic monologues in verse; then that I indited the bulk of a Covenanting novel—like so many others, never finished. Late I sat into the night, toiling (as I thought) under the very dart of death, toiling to leave a memory behind me. I feel moved to thrust aside the curtain of the years, to hail that poor feverish idiot, to bid him go to bed and clap Voces Fidelium on the fire before he goes; so clear does he appear before me, sitting there between his candles in the rose-scented room and the late night; so ridiculous a picture (to my elderly wisdom) does the fool present!

Baillie Brown's (or Cunzie House) was, unfortunately, not one of the old red-tiled dwellings which line the shore looking on the brown-sailed herring-boats coming in and out, and the white gulls circling round them, but a middle-aged house, standing rather listlessly with its shoulder to the high road that passes on to Crail, and with no view of the sea and not much of anything else from its windows. The Random Memories, from which we quote above, are supplemented now by two or three vivid, boyish letters from Anstruther, which open the selection from his correspondence that has lit up each number of Scribner, month by month, since January. We meet again in these letters the rose-leaves and the pier-foot, catch a glimpse of Mrs. Brown, "a motherly lot," and of the household economy; hear of a ride, a bathe, an evening with a strolling band of players in the town-hall, a visit to a psalmody class, where "one of the girls has a glorious voice," until at last, with a cold in his head and very homesick, he writes to his mother craving to be advised "to cut the business and come right slick out to Swanston."

Here, then, in Anstruther, during these summer days, the two branches of Stevenson's education were being carried on side by side—the education of an engineer, which was to have no result, save that to such as R. L. S. each piece of acquired knowledge is another key placed in his hand wherewith to unlock fresh doors in the kingdom of romance, and that other education, chiefly self-given, which was to make of him—

A priest to us all

Of the wonder and bloom of the world, an apostle of courage and of joy.

In my view [he says in a recently published letter] one dank, dispirited word is harmful, a crime of lèse-humanité, a piece of acquired evil; every gay, every bright word or picture, like every pleasant air of music, is a piece of pleasure set afloat. The reader catches it and, if he be healthy, goes on his way rejoicing; and it is the business of art so to send him as often as possible.

Memoirs of the Moment.

A GREAT deal of curiosity has been expressed as to the impressions made upon the Lord Chief Justice by the Dreyfus trial on the days that he sat it out at Rennes. In the Park on Sunday afternoon one of the speakers said he would give a penny for Lord Russell's thoughts about the court-martial, whereupon a second citizen cried out that "he could see through the generals." Of this particular trial Lord Russell, a guest for the occasion, would probably prefer to say little; and, as a matter of fact, that little would be hardly distinguishable amid the far more emphatic expressions of opinion pronounced generally by the English public and in the English Press. Lord Russell did not think the French procedure precisely the travesty of justice it was frequently represented to be; and, while far from pronouncing a verdict of "guilty," he yet thought there were unravelled clues and unexplained suspiciousnesses enough to explain why Frenchmen, swayed in their judgment by popular passions, might hesitate to pronounce innocence. One thing appeared quite clear to the great English lawyer—that a court-martial is far less satisfactory for a soldier so accused than would be the secular tribunal of the country, presided over by a civilian judge. That hint is one which must henceforth be borne in mind in England, as well as in France.

Among the most pleasant reminiscences of his brief command at Cape Town, Sir William Butler ranks his meeting with Mr. Schreiner and with Olive Schreiner. Under the peculiar circumstances, the acquaintanceship was mutually agreeable; and Olive Schreiner, in her new manifesto, refers to the "line of great Englishmen, from the days of General Dundas and Sir George Grey to those of Sir William Butler," who have treated the Boer from the standpoint of "broad humanity." As to that, the compliment to Sir William Butler, who is proud of nothing if not of being an Irishman, may be just a little impaired by that lack in our language of a word of common denomination for an Englishman, an Irishman, and a Scotsman.

THE illness of Mr. John Aird, M.P., has given all his friends a fright. There is now no longer any need for the straw which during the past fortnight has littered the Bayswater-road in front of the large corner house in Hyde Park-terrace; and Mr. Aird himself, instead of hospital nurses, takes daily drives in the Park, now empty of almost everybody except the invalids kept in town, or the friends who have stayed to nurse them, and whose meetings become almost comic in their daily recurrence. Mr. Aird dates his illness from his visit not long ago to Egypt, where he has an interest in the new irrigation works on the Nile.

MR. RICHARD WHITEING, who has lived in Paris, and has an intimate understanding of French moods, is expressing himself on the Dreyfus case in the new and revised edition of The Island, a brilliant novel which somehow missed making the success reserved to No. 5, John Street.

THERE were rather delicate situations connected with the visit of the three hundred French savants to Dover. At the Castle, for instance, the dungeons which derive their chief interest from their occupation by French prisoners had to go undescribed. It happened that very few of the guests had ever seen the English coast from France; so that they were all the more delighted when they saw France quite plainly from Dover. The friendly sense of neighbourliness suggested by the proximity of the two shores was kept somewhat in check by the sight of the immense military precautions taken against invasion from possible foes so close at hand.

THE visits of the Queen to the West of England have been very few, apart from the circumstance of her residence at Sidmouth in her early years. Probably to make up for this accidental neglect, rather than for any special importance of the occasion, the Queen will pay a visit to Bristol in November to open a hospital of moderate dimensions. Her visit puts an end to at least one local legend—that has assigned to Her Majesty an undying aversion for Bristol because, at the time of her wedding, some wag of the city hung out festoons, not of flowers, but of German sausages.

MR. JOHN MORLEY, who is deep in the interminable papers and letters of Mr. Gladstone, has found it necessary to seek special assistance in the task of arranging documents for the memoir. A young journalist, from the staff of a London weekly paper, has consequently been summoned to Hawarden to give to Mr. Morley the help he requires.

Correspondence.

Cary's Translation of Dante.

SIR,—The difficulty of translating the Divine Comedy lies not so much in its metre as in a certain consequence of that metre. The use of the complex terza rima imposed on Dante a terse and pregnant sentence-structure, sufficiently harmonious with his stern genius. It is these short sentences which render the choice of a metre for translation so perplexing. The terza rima simply will not do in English. The natural course in such a case is to throw over the original metre, and adopt some form of the verse nationally consecrated to epic poetry. So Cary thought, and used Miltonic blank verse. Now, obviously Miltonic blank verse is a very big coat, which fits ill on a very little man. Nevertheless, for an undeniably small man Cary really did not do so badly, and might have done yet better but for the inherent obstacles of his author.

He failed to realise that Miltonic blank verse, like terza rima, demands a certain type of sentence-structure, unfortunately, the very opposite type—a sentence structure ample, intricate, revolving to its close through many members. But how is such a necessity to be reconciled with the curt, sententious, pregnant structure imposed on Dante by terza rima, and exactly conformable with his genius? It is irreconcilable, and Cary did not grasp the point; consequently the brusque Dantean sentences are for ever clashing with the metre. Where the metrical character prepares us to anticipate a full and swelling procession of sound the sentence structure jerks us up abruptly. The result is like a man of deliberate stride walking among stones, over which he is perpetually stumbling with ungainly effect, for which he is not himself responsible, except that he should have chosen another walking ground or acquired another walk.

But what metre, then, shall we choose? Ah, there is the difficulty! It must be a metre which lends itself to this disconcerting brevity of the Dantean sentence, which is indigenous, and which is lofty—"of such high matter does it entertain." No "naturalised" metre will avail. Rhyming heroics are too contracted, too monotonous for a poem of such length; nor can the greatest master of metre keep them on the grand plane for more than a brief while, and by a tour de force. Solve this question and you have won half the battle. But so far translators have proved only the difficulty of solving it: they have tried the impossible terza rima; they have tried to substitute for it unrhymed triplets, flat as stale soda-water—in fact, no metre; and all have failed. Those curt Dantean sentences are only natural in a measure like terza rima, knotted up by its complex rhyme form. Find a like English measure which is at the same time elevated, or else fall back on some adaptable variety of blank verse—quite un-Miltonic. That is the way of Mr. Symonds in the occasional passages he rendered with no inconsiderable success, and it is perhaps the solution. But its achievement demands at least a quasi-poet; and even quasi-poets will seldom blunt their teeth on a solid epic; it is usually writers incapable of original work who seek fame in this way; and they are the very men from whom we can hope but a partial success. Nor is the exception of Longfellow one pour encourager les autres.—I am, &c., September 16, 1899.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

SIR,—The depreciation of old translations proceeds apace. I am glad your reviewer does not wholly give in to Mr. Kettle. May I venture to quote a verdict of some weight on the subject?

"It is generally better to read ten lines of any poet in the original, however painfully, than ten cantos of a translation. But an exception may be made in favour of Cary's Dante. If no poet was ever liable to lose more in translation, none was ever so carefully translated; and I hardly know whether most to admire the rigid fidelity or the sweet and solemn harmony of Cary's verse. . . . It is true that the conciseness and the rivulet-like melody of Dante must continually be lost; but if I could only read English, and had to choose, for a library narrowed by poverty, between Cary's Dante and our own original Milton, I should choose Cary without an instant's pause."—(The Stones of Venice, vol. ii., p. 262, new edition.)

Fortified by the opinion of the most considerable man of letters living, I do not mean to give up Cary just yet.—I am, &c.,

VERNON RENDALL.

Farcimosum Eruditio.

SIR,—We may reasonably assume that the public schools, too, represent those corporate machines for the manufacture of human sausages—if it be permissible to deploy into the same line of indefinite definition.

Far be it from me to do otherwise than defer to the author of "Farcimosum Eruditio"; but there is a shaft which draws reluctant—not mutinous—ink.

By the written law I am condemned as "crammed," for I have sat for the iniquitous examination, and certainly cannot claim to be "steeped" in any single Latin author.

What are the classics, then, for those who tread such paths?

"... They do not convey high thought or a large experience of men and things; they are not, as they were, 'litteræ humaniores, studia humanitatis et litterarum.' Their humanity is not perceived, their literature is not caught."

To declare that there may be sometimes an inner sanctuary, jealously guarded, where high thought strives to enter in, would be deemed facetious or sentimental in the public school boy.

To suggest, however respectfully, that a large experience of men and things, without extensive intercourse with both, is impossible, would, I feel, be presumptuous. But it is hard to be told that you have missed the humanity and the literature in their indivisible connexion when the drudgery is past. There inevitably remains a sense that the eye has gained some idea of proportion, that the ear has caught the sermon behind the word. "Sed vanitas vanitatum. . . ."

If we lived in the spacious days of a Johnson—but the "twin monsters" will not suffer.

Suffice it to say that there are those who live in the actual belief that the classics, despite the solemn iteration that they are "hammered and crammed," are yet, through their very essence, an appreciable force in the making of liberal-mindedness, if not of irreproachable scholarship.—I am, &c.,

"PUBLIC SCHOOL."

Another Knapsack Library.

SIR,—The following books, all, with the exception of the "Songs and Lyrics" and the "Temple Classics," in paper covers, would take up little space and lend themselves to that desultory reading which is perhaps most suited for a holiday:

Any two of Shakespeare's plays in the National Library Edition. 3d.

Religio Medici in the same edition or in the Temple Classics Edition.

Macmillan's two volumes of Tennyson's poems. 6d.

Wordsworth's Sonnets. Temple Classics.

Lamb's Essays of Elia. Temple Classics.

A volume (any volume) of Boswell's Johnson. Temple Classics.

Bacon's Essays. National Library.

The Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics. Second Series.

An Orthographic Peccadillo.

SIR,—I do not wish to pose as an authority on either English or Spanish, but I think your correspondents might turn their attention to the headline "PeccadilloES." This plural appears to be neither correct nor euphonious. As most of your correspondents have written incognitose (sic), I beg to subscribe myself,—Yours truly,

"PIFFERI DI MONTAGNA," &c.

September 13, 1899.

"David Harum."

SIR,—We observe with pleasure the article on David Harum in the current issue of your journal. It is not our business to make any comment on the criticism, but we wish to call your attention to a point which is evidently unknown to the writer, and that is, that the book has been selling in very considerable quantities for some weeks past. Although it has taken some time to catch the notice of the British public, it has undoubtedly now caught on, and is selling to the extent of some five hundred copies per week.

When the book was submitted to us by the American publishers, our reader reported favourably upon it. We offered to buy a small edition, which they accepted, not having apparently greater faith than ourselves in the likelihood of a distinctly American book having a large sale here. It took us some months to sell these copies, but now we are unable to get them over fast enough to supply the demand.

We are sorry that the critics have not reviewed it in the eulogistic manner of the writer of your article. It has, as a rule, only received that faint praise which does more harm to a book than a bad notice.

We trust your influential journal will be the means of making the book still more popular.—We are, &c.,
September 18, 1899. C. ARTHUR PEARSON, LTD.

The British Museum and Books.

SIR,—It may seem about time that the British Museum were now reorganised as a National Library, and nothing more. The vast increase in literature of all kinds, more especially in the direction of periodicals and journalistic prints, demands increased space; moreover, the books are crowded together in an unseemly manner, ingenuity having been exercised to economise space, to the humiliation of human intellect and genius. Let us have expansion, so that it may be a pleasure to walk round the galleries and inspect the contents (with a ticket of admission), instead of a mass of indiscriminate shelving! Let some access be given to the general public, so that they may see books as they now see minerals. The system now adopted in the King's and Grenville Libraries might then extend along the whole ground floor. Manuscripts, prints, engravings, maps, all claim attention, and might be made far more accessible.

Then, as to the "show" section—well, the animals have gone; much might be distributed among the Colonial and Foreign Offices; send minerals to the Geological Museum in Jermyn-street, gems to the South Kensington Museum. It is stated that the ethnological collections need more room, and a home is suggested for them also at Kensington.

It is certain that some radical change is necessary, and the boast of a real national library all to itself is worth some effort.—I am, &c.,
September 16, 1899. AN AMATEUR AUTHOR.

"And Which."

SIR,—In a paragraph in the ACADEMY of June 24, on the subject of a letter from Queen Victoria to Napoleon III., Her Majesty is spoken of "as a grammarian who cannot quite realise the superfluity of the 'and' before a relative which is not a reiterated one"; and the following passage from the letter is quoted: "We are in the midst of a ministerial crisis, and which I am afraid will be followed by others."

Will you allow me, with reference to this alleged "superfluity," to draw the attention of your readers to a query on the subject propounded in Notes and Queries of February 18 last, and to which no reply has so far been forthcoming. I strongly suspect that the first objector to the construction will be found to have been some one whose knowledge of English grammar was derived from school manuals rather than from acquaintance with the English classics.—I am, &c., C. J. IRVING.

"AND WHICH."—When did the use of "and which" in a clause where no previous "which" is found first begin to be proscribed? The following are a few examples of the usage, including some that have "and that" in place of "and which":

Wycliffe and Purvey, 1 Peter i. 4.—"Into eritage uncorruptible and undefouled, and that schal not fade."

Authorized Version.—"To an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away."

Sir Thomas More, Utopia, ii. 6.—"Usque adeo ut plumbeus quispiam, et cui non plus ingenii sit quam stiptiti."

Ralph Robynson's translation.—"In so muche that a lumpysh blokehedded churle, and whyche hathe no more wytte than an asse . . ."

Sir Thomas North, Plutarch: Julius Caesar.—"An army invincible and which they could not possibly with-stand."

Dryden, Essay of Dramatic Poesy.—"We have many plays of ours as regular as any of theirs, and which besides have . . ."

Dr. Johnson, Life of Addison.—"Two books yet celebrated in Italy for purity and elegance, and which, if they are now less read, are neglected only because . . ."

De Quincey, Life of Bentley.—"Of feuds so deadly, so enduring, and which continue to interest at a distance of a hundred and fifty years . . ."

Lord Beaconsfield, "Letter to the Duke of Marlborough."—"A danger in its ultimate results scarcely less disastrous than pestilence and famine, and which now engages your Excellency's anxious attention, distracts Ireland."

The following translation (Paul Stapfer) of a familiar passage in "Macbeth" seems to show that the usage is legitimate in French:

"C'est une histoire dite par un idiot, pleine de fracas et de furie, et qui ne signifie rien." C. J. I.

Announcements.

A NEW novel from the pen of the author of The Choir Invisible is likely to secure a good deal of attention, and Mr. James Lane Allen challenges curiosity at the outset through the choice of the uncommon title, The Mettle of the Pasture, which is suggested by the following passage in Shakespeare's "Henry V.":

And you, good yeomen,
Whose limbs were made in England, show us here
The mettle of your pasture; let us swear
That you are worth your breeding.

The book will be published during the autumn by Messrs. Macmillan.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. are publishing, simultaneously here and in America, The Life of William Makepeace Thackeray, which has been so long in preparation.

MR. MARION CRAWFORD'S new novel, Via Crucis: a Romance of the Second Crusade, now running its course through the pages of the Century, will be published very shortly in volume form by Messrs. Macmillan.

MESSRS. SEELEY & Co. have nearly ready for publication The Story-Books of Little Gidding, edited by Miss E. Cruwys Sharland. The book will consist of religious dialogues, held in the great room at Little Gidding, and now published for the first time from the original MS. of Nicholas Ferrar. The book will contain a memoir of the Ferrar family and an account of the story-books, also several interesting portraits and illustrations.

MISS C. A. HUTTON'S long-expected monograph on Greek Terra-cottas will be published by Messrs. Seeley in October. The book will contain a preface by Dr. A. S. Murray, Keeper of the Department of Greek and Roman Antiquities in the British Museum, under whom, and at the British School of Archaeology at Athens, Miss Hutton has for many years made a special study of this fascinating subject. The monograph will give an account of the use and meaning of the statuettes and the methods of manufacture, and also chapters on the genre statuettes, which throw much light on the social life of Ancient Greece. Of the numerous examples illustrated seventeen will be printed in colour.

MESSRS. GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., will publish shortly a History of Association Football, by N. L. Jackson. This book, which will comprise nearly 400 pages of text, with twenty full-page illustrations, will be a comprehensive work on the winter game.

MISS EDITH HENRIETTA FOWLER, who is known as the author of two representations of child life, has written a novel entitled A Corner of the West, the scene being laid in Devonshire. Miss Fowler is the daughter of Sir Henry Fowler and sister to Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler, the author of A Double Thread.

IN Life and Books Mr. Fisher Unwin published on Sept. 18 a group of essays by F. F. Leighton. They deal with such diverse subjects as the Nude in Modern Art, Originality, Men's Women and Women's Women, &c. In the essays certain forms of art and literature are examined for the expression they give to ever-changing social ideals. In one the visualising faculty, or power of inward vision, is used as a test of the poet's or painter's genius. In another a comparison is made between the different standards of womanhood as shown by masculine and feminine novelists in the characters of heroines. Besides these essays there is a short study of Niccolò Machiavelli's Discorsi, and his position as the first practical writer on politics is discussed. In "A Literary Reformer" an attempt is made to estimate the work of Ephraim Gothold Lessing in German literature.

MR. MACQUEEN will publish immediately Personal Recollections of Abraham Lincoln and the Civil War, by James R. Gilmore ("Edmund Kirke"), author of The Life of James Garfield, &c., &c. Mr. Gilmore was a personal friend of Mr. Lincoln's, and was one of the so-called "Peace Commissioners" sent by Lincoln to Jefferson Davis.

MR. JOHN LONG has in preparation for the autumn a new work by the Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Temple, Bart., entitled The House of Commons. Among other features the book presents the following: The House of Commons as a Club; The Precincts and the Buildings; Life in Parliament; Manners and Customs of the House; Leading Figures in Parliament; The Irish Nationalist Party; The Lords as Seen by the Commons.

HER MAJESTY has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of the new Canadian volume of poems by Miss Machar, The True North. It was presented to the Queen by the Earl of Aberdeen, a former Governor of Canada.

MESSRS. JOHNSON & GREIG, publishers, Lerwick, have at present in the press an important work on Shetland Folk-Lore, by John Mr. Spence, F.E.I.S. For more than forty years the author has been gathering from the lips of the old folk the sayings and superstitions handed down to them, and the work is the outcome of his gleanings in that field.

THE thirteenth volume of Book Prices Current will be published almost immediately. The editor furnishes an introduction, in which he records the characteristics of the sales of 1899, and furnishes a forecast of the tastes of collectors and of the prices of the future.

MR. GORDON PHILLIPS, who is already well known as the author of a number of Scottish romances (James Macpherson, &c.), will issue shortly with Mr. Fisher Unwin a story entitled The Laird's Wooing. It may be described as a romantic chapter in Scottish history. The subject is the courtship of the maiden of low degree by the proud feudal baron.

** Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.

TUNISIA AND THE MODERN BARBARY PIRATES.

WITH A CHAPTER ON THE VILAYET OF TRIPOLI.

By HERBERT VIVIAN, M.A., Author of "Servia, the Poor Man's Paradise," &c., &c. With over 70 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, price 15s.

"Mr. Vivian shows, as in his book on Servia, a pleasant capacity for seizing on the salient points of persons and things, for hitting off a portrait by an appropriate adjective, and for seeing the humorous side of what, to a dull man, would be certainly dull.....His book is eminently entertaining throughout, and the photographs by which it is embellished are very characteristic."—Morning Post.

"Mr. Vivian gives an interesting account of Arab and Jewish traits and customs, of the antiquities, the products, and the natural history of the Regency; and of the curious changes, mostly for the worst, that have been brought about in native character and habits by the presence and influence of the French. There is also an interesting chapter on Tripoli. The information is valuable and welcome, as books on Tunis are, as the author says, either obsolete or prejudiced."—Scotsman.

By JOSEPH HATTON, Author of "By Order of the Czar," &c. With Frontispiece by W. H. Margetson. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

"The deeds of highwaymen have provided Mr. Hatton with some stirring materials, which he sets before his readers in an engrossing fashion."—Observer.

"There is no lack of incident. From the opening glimpse of gentlemen of the road down to the closing chapter, with its vivid account of the last hours of Jack Sheppard, the story teems with excitement."—Yorkshire Post.

By EDWARD NOYES WESTCOTT. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A SELECTION OF

Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.'s PUBLICATIONS.

THE LAW OF FAITH. By the Rev. William BRIGHT, D.D., Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s. [2nd Edition.]

"A very valuable theological work.... Every page is the outcome of a richly stored mind, and a reader will find that any single theme is so treated as to suggest many fruitful topics for studious thought. It is not at all a book to be read hurriedly; it deserves, and will more than repay, steady attention..... Dr. Bright's style also may be specially commended to young men who desire to learn how to measure their words. He is not only theologically exact, but he is also signally successful in attaining to that literary charm of selecting the very word which expresses the writer's thought."—Guardian.

THE CLOSED DOOR. Instructions and Meditations given at various Retreats and Quiet Days. By the Right Rev. W. WALSHAM HOW, D.D. First Bishop of Wakefield. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

"Had anyone ever been disinclined to believe in Mr. Crockett's genius, he must have repented and repented in sackcloth and ashes after enjoying 'Sweetheart Travellers.' It is the rarest of all rarities, and veritably a child's book for children, as well as for women and men."—Times.

The Century Dictionary.

Issued by The Times.

Money paid for a book which is not used after it is bought is worse than waste. A useless book occupies useful space, accumulates dust, and is an eyesore to its possessor, who never looks at its covers without wishing he had his money back.

The Century Dictionary is a book that people use every day in the week. The dust never has a chance to settle on it. It does not take up any space on the bookshelves, for a convenient stand has been designed for its accommodation, so compact that it will fit into a corner of the smallest room. The Century Dictionary is so cheap a book, at the present price, that the man who buys it now will always remember with pleasure that its purchase was

A BARGAIN.

He will be glad, too, that he bought it before the price had been increased, as it will be in a short time. A limited edition is offered at a minimum price in order that this great word-book and fact-book may receive, as quickly as possible, the best of all advertisements—the commendation of people who have bought it and used it. At the price established by the publishers, the Century Dictionary could never have attained a broad popularity, for it was too costly a work for the more modest sort of libraries. The Times inaugurates its issue of the work by distributing the first impression at from this regular price. By sacrificing the profit which would have accrued from the sale, at an ordinary price, of a few thousand copies, a book can in this manner be more directly, and more quickly, presented to public attention than by any other means. In the case of the Century Dictionary this introductory sale is nearly finished. A great number of letters from pleased purchasers have been received and published by The Times. The persons who wrote these letters have talked to their friends about the book.

A broad and lasting demand has been established; the limited edition is nearly exhausted; and the provisional price must soon give way to a price more closely in accordance with the usual course of book-selling. Meantime, it is still possible for the reader to take advantage of the opportunity.

It is of interest, in this connection, to note that more than half the purchasers of The Times reprint of the Encyclopedia Britannica failed to act upon just such an intimation as this. More than 9,000 waited until after the price of the Encyclopedia had been increased, paying, at last, more money for precisely the same article. The best way to avoid such a mischance in the case of the Century Dictionary is to order the book to-day. A preliminary payment of but one guinea is the only outlay to be made in order to secure a copy of the limited edition at the introductory price, but the order should be sent without loss of time.

The CENTURY DICTIONARY

since it is at once an encyclopedia of words and a concise handbook of facts, may be said to yield more different kinds of information than any other work of reference in the world. It is a new work on a new plan—giving, for the first time, every form of spelling, pronunciation, and usage known, whether English, American, Australian, provincial or colloquial. It consists of eight handsome volumes, 7,000 large quarto pages, 500,000 definitions, 7,500 illustrations, 300,000 quotations, and the editorial cost, alone, of the work was more than £200,000.

The CENTURY DICTIONARY

is issued by The Times upon the plan of Monthly Payments of One Guinea each, which proved so successful in the case of The Times Reprint of the Encyclopedia Britannica. Only one of these payments need be made before the volumes are delivered. The limited edition which is now on sale is offered at a reduction of 45 per cent. from the publishers' price. Specimen pages, Order Forms, and full information may be obtained, gratis and post free, upon application to the MANAGER of THE TIMES, Printing House Square, London, E.C. Copies of the Dictionary in the various styles of binding may be examined at the OFFICE of THE TIMES; at the Advertising Agency of Messrs. STREET & CO., 164, Piccadilly; or at the establishment of Messrs. CHAPPELL & CO., Pianoforte Manufacturers, 50, New Bond Street. At any of these three addresses orders may be booked.

Several characters appear in this drama of a day, as for example, the Vicar's wife, with an amusing account of how she became a "society woman"; his daughter, his curate, his deaconess, his churchwardens, and others.

The Literary Week.

THE issue of the ACADEMY for next week will consist of a double number, and will include a supplement containing a classified list, extending over many pages, of all the new books and new editions announced for publication during the forthcoming season.

THE latest news of Mr. Grant Allen is more encouraging. Though still in an extremely precarious condition, he is suffering much less pain and is himself confident of recovery. The doctors are still unable precisely to describe his complaint.

'Tis an ill wind——. The action of the Times, which made it impossible for Lord Rosebery's Appreciations and Addresses to be sold any more in this country, has enabled the book to be advertised in America as "Suppressed in England."

FROM the new Stevenson letters in Scribner's. To Mr. Charles Baxter:

I shall have a fine book of travels, I feel sure; and will tell you more of the South Seas after very few months than any other writer has done—except Herman Melville, perhaps, who is a howling cheese.

To Mr. William Archer:

The voyage has agreed well with all; it has had its pains, and its extraordinary pleasures; nothing in the world can equal the excitement of the first time you cast anchor in some bay of a tropical island, and the boats begin to surround you, and the tattooed people swarm aboard.

To Mr. James Payn:

It is a good thing to be a good man, whether deaf or whether dumb; and of all our fellow-craftsmen (whom yet they count a jealous race), I never knew one but gave you the name of honesty and kindness: come to think of it gravely, this is better than the finest hearing.

A WELL-KNOWN character has just passed away in the person of Mrs. Baker, of Anne Hathaway's cottage, at Shottery, Stratford-on-Avon. Mrs. Baker, who claimed to be descended from Mrs. William Shakespeare, through Susan Hathaway, Anne's niece, had lived in the cottage for more than eighty years, so that there is no visitor to the famous shrine now living who has not seen her. To thousands of Americans Mrs. Baker must have stood as the typical old English countrywoman. Some years ago the trustees of Shakespeare's birthplace bought the cottage and established Mrs. Baker there as caretaker. Among the articles which were also purchased was the great bedstead in the upper room. Shakespeare's chair, however, left Shottery for Hampstead, where it became the property of Miss Crump. On Miss Crump's death it passed to America.

SINCE the early part of the year Mr. Anderson Graham has acted as Special Commissioner on Agriculture for the Morning Post, and will shortly publish the result of his investigations with Messrs. Jarrold & Son under the title of The Revival of English Agriculture. During the same period he has performed the arduous task of shaping and editing the book of chess which has been expected from Mr. Blackburn, English champion for the last forty years. Messrs. Longmans hope to issue the book early next month. It will contain a biography of Mr. Blackburn.

MR. WEDMORE has been selecting, for early publication by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, a number of the contributions on artistic and literary subjects which he has made during many years past to various Reviews and to the Standard. The title of this volume is to be On Books and Arts.

ONE of the most amusing misconceptions which we remember occurred in a recent Daily Chronicle, the whole mistake turning upon the two meanings of the word plant. This is the Chronicle's paragraph:

The Pope takes great interest in an electric plant, to which he has given the name of "Officina Electrica Vaticana Alessandro Volta," in honour of Volta. A few days ago his Holiness made a special inspection of these plants, and the employees of the Vatican gardens were presented to him by the chief.

A comic draughtsman should certainly commemorate the scene. The picture might hang at Kew.

THE sudden increase of thefts from London free libraries is another argument against the "free access" system, the libraries where this is adopted having suffered most. Clerkenwell, St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, Hornsey, the Cripplegate Institute, the Bishopsgate Street Institute, have all lost books. The theory is, however, not that thieves are growing more numerous, but that one thief has become more active. From the circumstance that no attempt has been made to sell any of the books in question, all of which are marked in several places, it is supposed that the thief is amassing a library of his own.

FREE access will not, we imagine, be adopted at Manchester when, next week, that city becomes the possessor of the famous Althorp Library, presented to it by Mrs. Rylands, the widow of the late John Rylands. The edifice in Deansgate which Mrs. Rylands has built to hold: he Althorp books is now ready, and formal presentation to be made on October 6. The Spencers, including the Earl Spencer from whom Mrs. Rylands bought the collection in 1892 for a quarter of a million pounds, amassed the books on generous principles. The Althorp Library comprises 80,000 volumes, including fifty Caxtons. Henceforward Manchester takes its place among the shrines of bibliophile and bibliomane.

AN instance of American Democratic prejudice occurs in the title by which one of Mr. Anthony Hope's novels is known in that country. Here, it is Mr. Witt's Widow; there, Witt's Widow.

THE generous action of another benefactor has just extricated the people of Olney from an ignoble position. The centenary of William Cowper's death falls next year, and it had been proposed that the event should be celebrated fittingly, among other plans being the purchase by the town of the poet's house at Olney to preserve as a monument of her most illustrious son and England's gentlest poet. Olney, however, did not fall in with the project at all, and the centenary celebration seemed likely to be inadequate until Mr. W. H. Collingridge, a great Cowper enthusiast, made the town a present of the house on the condition that the famous parlour shall be used as a Cowper museum. Mr. Collingridge, who is the owner of the City Press, was himself born in Cowper's house, and he has a large collection of Cowper relics and objects of interest which may serve as the museum's nucleus. His action is of more than local interest; the whole nation should be glad that Cowper's memory is thus to be honoured.

A MEMORIAL to another English poet has just been erected on foreign soil. Last week a tablet to the memory of Thomas Campbell, fixed to the door of the house in Boulogne in which he died, was unveiled, the occasion being the visit of the British Association to their French correlatives. Prof. Lewis Campbell, writing, as one of the few surviving descendants of the poet, to the Times on the subject, says: "Non omnis morietur. His once bright fame has been eclipsed by poets of richer quality and of larger volume. But morsels of his work are indestructible, and his public-spirited efforts in the cause of human progress, amongst which those on behalf of a 'teaching University for London' seem likely to bear late fruit, will have to be recorded in any complete review of the century now about to close. I shall never forget the generous words of Robert Browning, who said to me, in speaking of him both as a poet and as a critic of poetry, 'He was a great man.'"

THE relationship of The Island to No. 5, John Street, its sequel, has led Mr. Richard Whiteing, the author, to take in hand the earlier story and revise and augment it. The result has now been published by Mr. Grant Richards. From Mr. Whiteing's new preface we take this passage:

I have ever thought that our modern problems of human destiny should bear an emotional setting. All spring from the heart, and must return to it for their final appeal. Why should the great moving causes which stir so much the passion of pity on the one side, the passion of the sense of wrong on the other, be shut out of romantic literature—Democracy the cause of our age above all? It is to think poorly of fiction to narrow its bounds in any such way. We do it wrong, being so majestic.

They tell me that my Islanders are beginning to degenerate by in-breeding, both in body and in mind. Are they quite sure that the evil, in so far as it affects the spiritual part, does not lie rather with the observers than with the observed? I once read a French story in which it suited the purpose of the hero to feign insanity for a while. He accomplished it in the simplest way in the world—by leading a perfectly rational life. When he had nothing to say he said it, and he never made idle talk. When he had eaten his fill, he rose from table. In warm weather he laid aside all purely ceremonial clothing. In short, he lived according to reason, and he told the truth. The doctors agreed that it was an extremely bad case; and they had him in a strait-jacket in less than a week.

He [the student of economics] becomes less and less disposed to dogmatise, knowing very well that a man's development on any side of his subject often stops from the time when he comes to a reasoned conclusion about it. Hence he becomes known as a silent man who asks questions, and he incurs very likely the reproach of being a blind leader because he will not pronounce on such a thing as a labour dispute till long after the dispute has settled itself. He has nothing of the cloud-compelling confidence of other scientific teachers. By the nature of his subject he ought to be—and, I think, generally is—the humblest of men, and is indeed only too apt to spend the best years of his life in waiting for more light, and meantime throwing cold water on other people's enthusiasms. If afterwards he feels any superiority to his students, it is not that he knows a little more than they, but that he knows how little any one can know of law and order in this many-motivated work-a-day life of man.

New light on the Kingsleys is afforded by an interview with "Lucas Malet," Charles Kingsley's daughter, in the Windsor Magazine. According to the interviewer, the author of The Wages of Sin has "one grave and fundamental quarrel with Fate. It turned her out a woman, and not a man! She herself is of opinion that Nature jumbled things up altogether in the construction of her whole family, and distributed male and female characteristics at random!"

"I SOMETIMES wonder," the same lady also remarked, "whether our plots belong to people who have lived before us—our ancestors, you know, or something of that kind. There's no such thing as spontaneous generation, we know. They must have a beginning. They must come from somewhere. How are they suggested to us?" And here is a piece of sturdy optimism: "Everyone can have what he wants in this world if he only wants it hard enough, and if he only has the courage to take it when it comes. It doesn't do to hesitate. And if you're afraid—why, it's all over with you. Keep your head, and know what you want when you see it. That's where women fail as a rule; they lose their heads and get confused, and then the moment goes by and never comes back again. Or they're afraid—there's a risk attached, and they daren't face it. That's the mistake. There's a risk attached to every venture, though it's forgotten afterwards. You must face the chance of going to the bottom if you want to come to the top!"

THE ethnological and other writings of the late George Kingsley, Charles Kingsley's doctor brother, and the father of Miss Mary Kingsley, are about to be republished in a single volume under the title Notes on Sport and Travel. Miss Mary Kingsley will contribute an introduction.

ALMOST concurrently with the opening of the new Arts and Crafts Exhibition a minor commercial concern, with precisely similar ideals, begins its career. Mr. Montagu Fordham, the projector, has gathered together a number of artistic craftsmen who hold themselves ready to take orders for the furnishing and decoration of the home. English handiwork only will be employed. Among Mr. Fordham's associates are Mr. Cobden Saunderson and Mr. Douglas Cockerell, for book-binding; Mr. Sidney H. Barnsley and Mr. W. R. Lethaby, for furniture; Miss May Morris, for embroidery; Mr. Louis Davis and Mr. C. M. Gere, for stained glass; Mr. G. P. Bankart, for plaster work; and the Birmingham Guild of Handicraft, and others, for metal work. The scheme is a good one, and it will, we hope, be successful. Mr. Fordham's shop, which is in Maddox-street, opens on Monday.

DECORATIVE pictorial covers are becoming increasingly popular. Certainly, although although a severe taste may object to them, they are an improvement upon the lurid designs on the old yellow-backs. Although quite out of place on the library shelves, the new method of indicating the nature of the book by means of the scene on the cover is a useful one; for it gives the would-be purchaser the keynote of the book in advance. We reproduce a good example of a keynote cover—that belonging to Nell Gwyn's Diamond, by I. Hooper, published by Messrs. A. & C. Black. If we are to have pictorial covers for novels this is the way to do them.

TRULY, as Father Matthew Russell recently wrote,

Professor R. Yelverton Tyrrell
In Latin is brisk as a squirrel.

Within the covers of a comely book entitled Florilegium Latinum the Rev. F. St. John Thackeray and the Rev. E. D. Stone have gathered together a number of very agreeable and skilful experiments by the gentlemen who still write Latin verse with ease. The book contains many excellent and brilliant versions, but what particularly strikes us, on looking it through, is Prof. Tyrrell's extraordinarily agile treatment of Hood's "Bridge of Sighs." We give the opening lines:

IRRENEABILIS UNDA.

a! misera sortis
pondere fessa!
a! temere mortis
viam ingressa!
tollite facile
onus tam bellum, onus tam gracile,
tamque tenellum.
panni gravatum
cadaver adstringunt, vestes elatum
ceu funebres cingunt, undam stillantes
heu! illaetabilem:
statim?—amantes
ferre amabilem.

In any form the poem would be sufficiently difficult to master, but that both rhyme and metre should be reproduced is indeed an achievement. The other translations, with the exception of the "Bridge of Sighs," are only of pre-Victorian poems. A second volume, devoted to Victorian originals, will follow.

A LITTLE while ago we quoted Miss J. H. Findlater as saying that only the part of Scotland between Peebles and Galloway had not been appropriated by any kailyard or other writer. But, according to a critic in the Glasgow Evening News, Miss Findlater understated the case altogether. He writes: "The greater part of Scotland is yet to be written about. Our Midlands have not yet produced their novelist; Edinburgh and Glasgow are a field untouched in modern literary art. Rural Scotland has hitherto monopolised the attention of every ambitious penman, and the cities and towns have been severely left alone. It must be because the interests presented in the teeming multitudes of a place like Glasgow are so great as to be appalling. Here, at all events, is every element of great, and moving, and permanent prose literature. Here more passions war, intrigue is more startling and profound than in Thrums and Drumtochty, pathos is among us in its triple essence, comedy and tragedy are in every close. It is true that Miss Tytler and Mr. William Black have given Glasgow backgrounds to stories, but that is nothing: the city we know, of streets, shops, slums, ships, factories, grime and grandeur, enterprise and toil, has never been the motive of a story. Pioneers, oh, pioneers! this is no footing little claim; it's a blessed Bonanza."

MR. HALL CAINE's own dramatic version of The Christian is about to be performed in London. America, as our readers will remember, has already had the privilege of witnessing it. Mr. Caine states in a prefatory note that he has not, strictly speaking, dramatised the book. Instead, he has merely "taken the two principal characters of the novel, as well as the motive of their relation to each other, and made an independent drama of new incidents and fresh surroundings—just as he might have taken two characters from history and constructed thereon a play which could otherwise have no claims to historical truth. The two principal characters of this drama," Mr. Caine continues, "represent types which have been brought into existence by the latter half of the nineteenth century—the educated girl who has to fight the battle of life in professions which are usually controlled by men, and the young clergyman who makes an effort to realise, in a literal sense, the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount. But the social and religious problems which surround the steps of these characters in the novel are not dwelt upon in the play, which is simply a story of love."

SOME litigation, it is said, is likely to ensue between Mr. Hall Caine and Mr. Wilson Barrett before The Christian, the drama in which the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount is made manifest, has run its course. Another forthcoming play, the version by an American adaptor, of Lorna Doone, is also to be a subject of contention. Mr. Blackmore has made public the statement that the only authorised version is that by Mr. Horace Newte.

NUMBER II. of The Elf: a little book lies before us. This freakish publication proceeds from Peartree Cottage, Ingrave, Essex, and is the work of Mr. J. J. Guthrie. Half a dozen plates (better in design than reproduction), a fairy story, an essay, and three poems make up the number. One of the poems promises to be a complete alphabet on new lines, of which the first eight letters only are already given. It runs thus:

A. was an Ant-hill, and B. was a Boy
Who came with intention the Ants to annoy;
C. the Catastrophe, D. the Distress
On the face of the boy in a minute or less.

E. was an Earwig, and F. was the Flower
That Earwig intended in time to devour,
G. was the Gard'ner, and H. was his Heel
Which the mischievous insect was destined to feel.

Literary Life, the new American weekly paper of which we spoke in our last number, has inaugurated its career by inviting its readers to play once more the Academy game. The aim of the editor is to select an American Academy on the model of that of France—that is to say, to consist not merely of literary men, but of the forty most capable men in all branches of intellectual achievement. To facilitate matters a list to choose from has been drawn up, which we reproduce below. We are obliged to confess complete ignorance of many of the names :

Historians : John Fiske, Eugene Schuyler, Edward Eggleston, Hubert Howe Bancroft, John Bach McMaster, John Clark Ridpath, James Schouler, H. Von Holst.

Essayists : Charles Dudley Warner, Dr. Henry Van Dyke, Thomas W. Higginson, Henry M. Alden, Donald G. Mitchell, John Burroughs.

Politicians : Hon. Wm. McKinley, Carl Schurz, Admiral George Dewey, Henry Cabot Lodge, Senator George F. Hoar, Joseph R. Hawley.

Philanthropists : Edward Everett Hale, D.D., Andrew Carnegie.

Professors : Hon. Andrew D. White, President Benjamin Ide Wheeler, Prof. William James, President Dean C. Worcester, President A. T. Hadley of Yale, President Daniel C. Gilman, Prof. C. E. Norton, Prof. Wm. Z. Ripley.

Dramatists : Bronson Howard, Augustus Thomas, David Belasco, Clyde Fitch.

Humorists : Samuel L. Clemens, H. C. Bunner, Robert Burdette, Frank R. Stockton, J. C. Harris, Robert Grant.

Novelists : Henry James, Geo. W. Cable, Miss Wilkins, Wm. Dean Howells, Mrs. Deland, Mrs. Burnett, Francis Marion Crawford, Mrs. Catherwood, A. S. Hardy, Francis Bret Harte, Edgar Fawcett, Lew Wallace, Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, Julian Hawthorne.

Poets : Edmund Clarence Stedman, John J. Piatt, Richard Henry Stoddard, R. W. Gilder, Thomas Bailey Aldrich, John Hay, Mrs. Howe, W. H. Hayne, James Whitcomb Riley, Joaquin Miller, Father Tabb, Celia Thaxter.

Critics : Hamilton W. Mabie, George E. Woodberry.

Journalists : E. L. Godkin, Whitelaw Reid, Chas. H. Taylor, Henry Watterson, Chas. Emory Smith.

Ecclesiastic : Bishop Potter.

Lawyer : Joseph H. Choate.

Sculptor : Augustus St. Gaudens.

Scientist : Thomas Edison.

Many comments rise to mind as we read this list. One is that Mr. H. C. Bunner died two or three years ago; another that the French Academy includes no philanthropists, and that even if it did Dr. E. E. Hale's name would come more fittingly with the story-tellers. But it is, of course, for the readers of Literary Life to straighten out these things.

Bibliographical.

A PASSAGE in Mr. Melville's Life of W. M. Thackeray raises again a question which has always been of interest to lovers of literature and the drama : Did Thackeray collaborate with Pierre Tournemine in producing the melodrama called "L'Abbaye de Pemarc'h," which was produced at the Théâtre Porte St. Antoine, Paris, in February, 1840? When H. L. Williams published, in 1884, an English version of this play, he boldly ascribed it to the novelist, giving sundry reasons for so doing. "L'Abbaye de Pemarc'h" is, however, accessible in the original French, and on the title-page we find it attributed to MM. Tournemine and "Thackeray" (without initials). That Thackeray was in Paris in 1840 is matter of history, and "L'Abbaye de Pemarc'h" may have been part-product of his pen. Much more likely is it that the "Thackeray" of "L'Abbaye" was the novelist's cousin, Captain Thomas James Thackeray, who was long resident in Paris where he was visited by Planché. This Captain Thackeray, we know, dabbled in the drama, having been guilty of at least two adaptations from the French—a drama called "The Executioner," and a farce called "The Barber Baron," which saw the light in London in 1828 and 1830 respectively. He also collaborated in a comedy called "My Wife or My Place," produced at the Haymarket in 1831. In the following year he published a treatise On Theatrical Emancipation and the Rights of Dramatic Authors; and, altogether, it seems much more probable that "L'Abbaye de Pemarc'h" was written by him than that W. M. Thackeray had any hand in it. T. J. Thackeray, by the way, does not figure in the Dictionary of National Biography.

I note among the announcements of the Clarendon Press new editions of the works of John Gower and of Thomas Kyd, of the plays and poems of Robert Greene, and of the critical essays of John Dryden. For an edition of the complete works of Gower there is obviously room. The thing is a desideratum, inasmuch as there is nothing in the market now save the reprint of the Confessio Amantis in the "Carisbrooke Library." Of Gower's minor works there appears to have been no edition since that of the Roxburgh Club in 1818. Of Kyd's works, too, there is no available edition. His Spanish Tragedy was lately reproduced in dainty guise; and that, and the Cornelia, and the Soliman and Perseda, are in the Dodsley collection; but a complete edition of Kyd is certainly to be desired. Greene, of course, was edited by Dyce in 1831, and, in a sort of way, by Robert Bell in 1846; there is also the elaborate Grosart edition of 1881-86. Still, there is room for something less elaborate than Grosart. Greene is a writer of whom, for many reasons, the new generation should know more than is known by its elders. Which of Dryden's critical essays are to be reproduced I do not know; and upon that everything depends. The Dramatic Poesy has been reprinted within the last few decades by Mr. T. Arnold, Mr. E. Arber, and Mr. W. H. Low; the Satire and the Epic Poetry were republished in 1886, the Satire and Translation in 1882 (ed. Yonge). A handy edition of all the critical essays would be welcome.

Minor reprints of which notice is given are those of Earle's Microcosmography, Defoe's Journal of the Plague, and Crabbe's Borough. Of the first of these we had two reproductions so recently as 1897 (one of them being based on the Bliss text of 1811). Then there is the 1868 reprint by Mr. Arber. Defoe's Plague is equally accessible—in an edition by Routledge (1893), and in the same firm's "World Library" and "Universal Library." The edition illustrated by Cruikshank in 1872 (and brought out again in 1882) might well be reissued at this juncture. Crabbe's Borough has not been printed separately since 1853. No doubt the reprint will justify itself; but one would rather have a new complete edition of Crabbe—something more obviously for the library and for study than the little book included in the "Canterbury Poets."

There are two anthologies of English verse of which I am glad to see the announcement: I refer to English Elegies and The Kings' Lyrics. If my memory serves me, both of these have some novelty of idea. The last-named, it seems, will cover the reigns of James I. and Charles I. Why not that of Charles II.? Nay, why not give us a selection from all the songs inspired by devotion to the House of Stuart? In regard to the book of Elegies, I am curious to see whether it will, or will not, be brought "down to date," for, as I need hardly tell my readers, among the most touching of English elegies are some of those written by Mr. Swinburne—notably that on the death of Barry Cornwall.

Mr. C. B. Fernald has published in book form his adaptation of "The Ghetto," and it is understood that he is to follow it up with the text of his two original plays, "The Cat and the Cherub" and "The Moonlight Blossom." We are further taught to expect from him a book of Stories of China Town.

The Pigeon-holing of Matthew Arnold.

Matthew Arnold. By George Saintsbury. (Blackwood.)

WE do not know anything very positive about Prof. Saintsbury's temperament; but a careful reading of his Matthew Arnold is enough to convince us that it is not the temperament which can deal fairly with Matthew Arnold. Mr. Saintsbury, despite his curious tendency to inaccuracy and to conclusions based upon insufficient grounds—his passion, in a word, for building up a huge general out of a minute particular—has the sort of mind which is best understood under a figure of pigeon-holes. Prof. Huxley, without Mr. Saintsbury's tendency to inaccuracy, had very much the same sort of mind. It is a mind which, if it be combined with any considerable thinking powers, can make a great impression on the world, and has, indeed, in many of its manifestations, made such an impression. We have said that Mr. Saintsbury has the pigeon-hole form of mind, despite that which appears to be almost his constitutional failing; for here precisely lies the paradox. The pigeon-hole form of mind tolerates no doubt, has no fears, despises all opponents, and possesses scarcely any dramatic imaginativeness. It is, as a rule, extremely industrious, and it derives its name from the fact that it is in the habit of collecting any quantity of conclusions and facts, tying them up in separate bundles, and, after carefully drying and labelling them, putting them away for future use in the pigeon-holes of memory. They then become, so to put the matter, stock-in-trade. As has been implied, if your facts are carefully selected and verified, and if your conclusions are impressive and plausible, the pigeon-hole mind is a very useful possession indeed. It is the sort of mind that gets on in the world. On that side stands Prof. Huxley. But what if your facts are picked up here and there (chiefly at random), and are then bundled together without very careful sorting? What if your conclusions are mostly based on assumptions of by no means acceptable or catholic first principles? What if the lack of power to sustain close argument brings those conclusions, even when the first principle is admitted, into some fallacious finish? The result is that you still are a little awed by the dead sort of certitude which invariably distinguishes the pigeon-hole mind, but that it is impossible, under the influence of a little careful thought, to regard either the statements of fact or the cocksure little conclusions with a very deepset respect or a very serious sympathy. Need it be added that Prof. Saintsbury stands on this side—that this is his province in the kingdom of the pigeon-hole mind? Here he is the satrap indeed.

Now at its very best this sort of temperament would have been ignobly inadequate for the expounding of such a personality as that of Matthew Arnold. If there was one thing with which Arnold had not a shred of sympathy it was the method of pigeon-holing applied to any mental process whatsoever. Macaulay, just because he was the most brilliant, the keenest, the most consummate example of this class, provoked him to unreasoning, if not altogether unreasonable, indignation. "What has he ever taught these times?" That was Arnold's question; and if you granted the underlying premise, you felt that the question, from Arnold's point of view, dismissed Macaulay into space. But Mr. Saintsbury, while perceiving, as everybody must perceive, Arnold's point of view, stands clear outside any sympathetic understanding of it. With amazing stolidity he pulls, on all occasions, out of pigeon-hole x, y, or z a set of conclusions which are naturally based upon premises which begin by being the precise contradictory of Arnold's premises. Without pausing to inquire—that would be a denial of the law—into the nature of either his own or Arnold's first principles, he condemns his man out of hand for the sole reason that Arnold's conclusions are not Mr. Saintsbury's.

Let us take one crucial and particular instance which demonstrates this point finally and beyond recall. Arnold, as we all know, had a peculiar prejudice against the dry and undramatic study of history which belongs to our system of modern education. "I do not like the course for the History School at all; nothing but read, read, read endless histories in English, many of them by quite second-rate men; nothing to form the mind as reading really great authors forms it, or even to exercise it as learning a new language, or mathematics, or one of the natural sciences exercises it." There, on a definite point, was a statement made by Arnold and built up through a certain train of reasoning which had for its basis a fixed first principle by which the theorist chose to regulate the usefulness and advantages of this or that kind of mental development. Now what does Mr. Saintsbury here? He flies to the pigeon-hole marked h, and takes down a bundle which contains this for its ascertained premiss and conclusion: "The study of history is one of extreme importance; therefore the man who does not care for the history course cannot be regarded seriously as an educator; but Mr. Arnold was such a contemner; therefore . . ." Mr. Saintsbury does not formulate his conclusions quite so definitely as this; but it is enough that he deduces in Arnold a "dislike to history," declares that to a "man of ideas" history must be "an annoying study," because "the things that ought to happen do not happen, and the things that do happen have to be awkwardly explained away." Could anything show more clearly than this how hopelessly impossible it is for one of Mr. Saintsbury's temperament ever to understand the springs, the sources from which a man like Arnold drew his theory and his teaching? Here the case is narrowed down to a definite issue. Arnold's position is clear; so is Mr. Saintsbury's; but because each position has its own atmosphere of sense and significance, it is impossible for one to live in the atmosphere of the other. The very essence of the same words of the same proposition as used by the two men differs with each utterance. For Arnold's meaning is beset by a thousand subtle comparisons, relations and siftings. Mr. Saintsbury's is, we fear, as plain and as bald as a geometrical axiom, and leads to conclusions as unprofitable as they hit wide of the mark.

When, then, it comes to a discussion by Mr. Saintsbury of Arnold's religious position, the result is as grotesque as it is exasperating. Mr. Saintsbury's boisterous orthodoxy clamours, and grins, and twists in elephantine curves, and is throughout magnificently certain of itself. Out come the first principles, tumbling one over the other in their anxiety to be stated, where to have been stated suffices apparently for Mr. Saintsbury's purpose. "Not believe in hell-fire!" said the devout believer to the doubter. "Not believe in hell-fire! Why, I know that hell-fire exists." That is the Professor's attitude. Arnold, with his splendid and sincere desire to get at the meaning even of orthodoxy—"Don't read St. Paul under the influence of a Sunday convention; get at the back of his actual, living meaning"—that Arnold is placed by Mr. Saintsbury "In The Wilderness" (the actual title of the chapter devoted to this portion of the life). We are not concerned here to defend Matthew Arnold's religious theories; but it is fitting that a biographer should be able to understand, by some sort of imaginative sympathy, the mental attitude of his subject. Mr. Saintsbury may be right, for all we care, in every single point of his theory of religion. What we require in a book of this kind, however, is some intelligent stating of Arnold's case, some presentment of his actual frame of mind, some touching of the fountains from which he drew his doctrine, some delineation of cause and effect, as these developed in the workings of a rare and subtle spirit. We get none of this from Mr. Saintsbury. He frankly sees no responsibility other than to take up scattered propositions from Arnold's works and argue, argue, argue, for all the world like any hot-gospeller. The futility of the position could not be overstated. In nine cases out of ten, even on the mere point of argument, which nobody wants and which profits nothing, Mr. Saintsbury is baldly and grimly unconvincing. Take one sufficing example. "The prophecy of the details of Peter's death," says Arnold in Literature and Dogma, "is almost certainly an addition after the event, because it is not at all in the manner of Jesus." "Oho!" cries Mr. Saintsbury, "and where do you get any knowledge of the 'manner of Jesus' outside the Gospels?" And then (we quote now textually): "So you must, by the inner light, pick and choose out of the very same documents what, according to your good pleasure, is 'in the manner of Jesus,' and then black-mark the rest as being not so"—with a great deal more to the same effect. That is precisely the case. Did Arnold ever deny that he had no knowledge of Jesus outside the Gospels? Does he not practically say: "In the consistent pictures the Gospels give, in bulk, of Jesus, the prophecy of Peter's death does not take a natural place?" He may be right or he may be wrong; but it is a clear proposition, and is scarcely answered by a mere restatement of the very grounds on which its conclusion is based. But that is Mr. Saintsbury's way of argument. It is nothing more or less than a long exposition of the fact that Mr. Saintsbury has no capacity whatever of presenting to you any vital picture or even vital impression of the personality of Arnold.

We have left ourselves but scant space in which to discuss Mr. Saintsbury's attitude towards Arnold the poet, as distinguished from Arnold the thinker; but there is little enough that we could say of profit. There are better things to be found, however, in the book when we enter this province; but they are none of them very illuminative, or even passably striking. Mr. Saintsbury leaves no clear and exact impression of what he really thinks of Arnold, regarded as a writer of poetry as a whole rather than as a writer of separate poems. He tells you, taking those poems seriatim, that he likes four lines here, but dislikes the two lines immediately following; there are three stanzas in one poem, perhaps, of high-water mark, and two in the same poem which show Arnold at his worst; and so forth, and so forth. That is the sort of thing which supplies the argument of page after page. A good deal of it may be sound enough; but, frankly, we do not very much care if it is, although we can quite understand that Mr. Saintsbury was not naturally the man to do the thing according to any other method. For here that fatal temperament comes in again. Mr. Saintsbury is scholar enough to pick out a couple of lines, a stanza or a long poem, and to discuss them all with a complacent air of authority. But it is literally the dead page, not the living poet's soul, of Matthew Arnold that he chooses for his commentary. You do not leave the book with any definite impression of the fulness, the totality of the poet's work. You are only aware, for Mr. Saintsbury lets you know it with damnable iteration, that he does most cordially admire the famous lines—

Still nursing the unconquerable hope,
Still clutching the inviolable shade.

So far as these two lines go, it is certain that Mrs. Micawber never will desert Mr. Micawber.

The biographical element in the book again is extremely slight; but Mr. Saintsbury is aware of it and has his explanation pat. For the rest, the actual writing, though far from satisfactory at all times, is a good deal better, on the whole, than the writing to be found in most of the recent works published by this hand. Such words as "epistoler" and "equivalenced" still star his pages; you come across such a sentence as, "Despondency is a pretty piece of melancholy, and, with a comfortable stool, will suit a man well"; but on the whole, there are fewer evidences of Mr. Saintsbury's slipshod and confused manner in his Matthew Arnold than we had dared to expect.

Woman.

Women and Economics: A Study of the Economic Relation between Men and Women as a Factor in Social Evolution. By Charlotte Perkins Stetson. (Putnam's.)

Questions for Women (and Men). By Honnor Morten. With an Introduction by Mrs. Fawcett, LL.D. (A. & C. Black.)

HERE are two books written by and about women. There is no resemblance in their methods and very little in their aim. The one is wholly theoretic, the other almost wholly practical. The one deals with the world's "change of heart," the other mainly with certain vulnerable joints in our existing social and industrial armour. Mrs. Stetson offers us something like a system of sociology; Miss Morten shows us where and how the woman who wants to be socially helpful can best apply her energies. Her book is, in spite of its title, not at all controversial; it contains not so much "questions" as—if the expression may be permitted—"tips." Its curious and interesting relation to Mrs. Stetson's longer volume lies in its point of view. Mrs. Stetson's whole aim is to demonstrate: (1) that woman has not been an independent economic unit; (2) that the whole race has suffered by her dependence; and (3) that this dependence is on the way to cease, greatly to the gain of the whole world. Miss Morten does not talk at all about the independence of women, but almost every word of her book rests upon the assumption that women are independent. The average English reader, naturally hostile to general ideas, will be able to read it with perfect comfort; will find in it all sorts of "practical" facts, and useful instructions as to details of conduct; and will, not impossibly, be strengthened unawares in a habit not so much of believing women to be independent human beings as of acting as though they were.

But when he turns to Women and Economics—which, on account of its title, he will, no doubt, be slow to do—this same average reader will find himself singularly disconcerted. He will be compelled by unanswerable arguments to admit that all women used to be, and that most women still are, economically dependent upon men; that the money they receive is not measured by the work they do, but by the wealth of the man belonging to them; and that, in short, they are not paid by or for their work at all. This position having been established, he will be carried on to consider the result of such economic dependence. The first result has been to make marriage a livelihood for women—a calling undertaken, like other callings, largely upon commercial considerations. The natural grounds of selection—so advantageous to the future development of the race—tend to be overridden. The woman seeks not only the desired mate, but also the supporter who can provide her with the material necessities of life. Another result has been to cut off women from the general stream of industrial development; to keep them isolated workers, employed in comparatively simple, but multifarious, processes, instead of sending them out to share the complex co-operative processes of some single highly specialised trade.

The woman who, in her own home, follows a score of callings, must, by the nature of things, fail to reach the highest excellence in any. Her skill, whatever its degree, is acquired, as the earliest workers acquired theirs, by practice, by rule of thumb, and each generation has to begin the work over again from much the same starting-point. Cut off from wide social interests, cultivated only on the side of her family affections, woman has naturally remained a creature of narrow views, and her influence on man has accordingly been a narrowing one. A mother who sees nothing beyond the family horizon cannot be expected to imbue her sons with wide public spirit. If, however, economic dependence were the necessary condition of healthy motherhood—if, in other words, the well-being of the race demanded it—all these concomitant evils, however clearly recognised, would have to be accepted and endured. The price might be heavy, but it would have to be paid. The question whether this is so is next considered, and the conclusion arrived at, that so far from being better equipped for maternal functions, the carefully supported woman who lives and works in her own home is rather less fitted for motherhood than the savage or the peasant; while mentally she is rather less competent as an educator than the father who has lived in the larger developments of the world, or the teacher trained not in the enclosed home but outside it. At this point Mrs. Stetson, for the first time, seems to overstep the mark a little. That the average human mother falls considerably below the standard of motherhood conceived by the best and most enlightened of her race is unquestionable. But that the animals are, in their sphere, much more successful may be doubted. Few of us who have had animal friends have not lost one at least at the birth of offspring. Human infantile mortality stands, indeed, sadly high; but what of the kittens, the puppies, the young birds, who in a state of nature fall victims every year not only to enemies or to climatic mischances, but to the neglect or stupidity of their mothers? Hens frequently refuse to feed a second brood, and leave the chicks to starve; cats—and the cat is a good mother—will hide their young and lose them, or drop them from high places, or desert them. Why, the very circumstance that one at a birth suffices to keep the human race going, while a reserve is necessary to the quadrupeds, shows that the woman manages better. No, it cannot be maintained that the human mother is less competent than the mother cat or than the mother hen; what cannot be disputed is, that she is much less competent than she might be if she were a better developed creature.

As a housekeeper, in the widest sense of the word, Mrs. Stetson finds the dependent woman no more satisfactory than as a mother. She points out, as so many other writers and speakers have done, the extravagance, the waste of labour, and the poor results in the way of comfort that attend our present system of housekeeping. Most reformers who touch this subject do but preach in the wilderness; and the reason why no one marks them is that they do not discriminate between the common kitchen and the common home. In England, at any rate, the human creature as at present developed does not desire to share his home with a crowd of fellow creatures, however charming or cultivated. He desires to have at least one room all to himself; and is tempted by no promise of space or splendour, or good food or low prices, if these are to be bought at the cost of privacy. Mrs. Stetson avoids this accustomed confusion of the kitchen and the home. "We are not going," she says, "to lose our homes, nor our families, nor any of the sweetness and happiness that go with them. But we are going to lose our kitchens, as we have lost our laundries and bakeries. The cook-stove will follow the loom and wheel, the wool carder and the shears. We shall have homes that are places to live in and love in, to rest in and play in, to be alone in and to be together in; and they will not be confused or de-classed by admixture with any industry whatever."

While deploring the dependence of women, and looking with eagerness to the day of its total disappearance, Mrs. Stetson does not attribute that dependence either to the deliberate malice of man or the deliberate folly of woman. On the other hand, she sees that it was at one stage useful, and perhaps essential, for the race. She perceives that man, as the guardian and provider of woman and child, had to assume a position and qualities quite undeveloped in other male animals, who leave their mate and progeny to shift for themselves. "The subjection of woman has involved, to an enormous degree, the maternalising of man. Under its bonds he has been forced into new functions impossible to male energy alone. He has had to learn to love and care for someone besides himself. He has had to learn to work, to serve, to become human."

There has been another gain to the race which Mrs. Stetson does not note. In the upper middle class of this country, and perhaps in even greater measure in the corresponding class in America, while the brothers become early engrossed in the strenuous competition of modern commerce, the sisters—whose age of marriage is deferred by the fact that the possible husband must first earn enough to keep himself and his wife—remain longer at school or college, and, when they return home, have leisure which they often employ in reading and study. Such women are generally better educated than their brothers and husbands. They form an artificially leisured class, and have turned their leisure to good use. From mothers of this group come England's best and ablest men; and from women of this group, married and unmarried, has come almost exclusively the movement for more freedom, more social activity, more personal life. The existence of this class makes possible such a manual as Miss Morten's, with its notes upon college life, upon public work, upon women's settlements, upon nursing and education. Women of this class, engaged in all sorts of public work, we see around us daily and accept quite contentedly. Nobody nowadays is shocked, and the nation is perceptibly the richer. Yet when these changes are formularised and set out in general terms many of us will be ready to exclaim and deny and to denounce Mrs. Stetson as a dangerous and subversive writer. Such dissentients may be reminded of Mr. John Morley's dictum, which, acknowledging that women may be regarded either as wives or mothers, or as independent human beings, boldly declares that a writer's appreciation of the conditions of human progress may be estimated by his attitude in regard to women, and that the writer who thinks of woman rather as wife and mother than as an independent person will have comparatively mean notions even of wifehood and motherhood.

If the writer, surely also the reader may be thus estimated, and Mrs. Stetson's book may be used as a touchstone. To-day it will meet with opposition and dispute—more or less according as we appreciate more or less truly the conditions of human progress. Ten years hence—perhaps five years hence—it will be accepted eagerly; twenty years hence it will be a mere milestone of history, as Mary Wollstonecroft's Education of Daughters is to-day. These are the stages through which books must pass which contain true analyses of transient societies. But the literary historian who, somewhere towards the latter half of the twentieth century, in order to write the record of woman's extinct economic dependence, looks up Mrs. Stetson's volume will find, amid phrases grown old-fashioned and arguments long since admitted, a sparkle of wit, a lucidity of statement, and an admirable spirit of justice and allowance, likely even in those improved days to be still rare among controversialists.

A Champion of the Maori.

A Sketch of the New Zealand War. By Morgan S. Grace, C.M.G. (Marshall.)

THERE are occasions when the most skilful literary man may strive and strive, pile word on word, pursue epithet and image, in his endeavour to make his story live, and not all his art can overcome a something antipathetic which frustrates his every effort. And then the amateur may step carelessly into the ring, dash down a few unpremeditated sentences, and snatch the laurel by virtue of possessing some vivifying essence which stamps his effort vital. The book before us is another instance of the success of the amateur. The author is a man of action, a politician, with a non-literary mind. All he set out to do was to recall his adventures in the New Zealand War in the early sixties, and thus enable the English reader to learn "what blundering asses we were and what fine fellows the Maori." There are a score of indications that he wrote his little history with a running pen: it is without careful order, it is tangential and scrappy; and yet it lives; the thing has been done. Mr. Grace, as his title tells us, thought that he was writing a mere sketch, a hurried outline; but instead the essential details are all here too. What is more, the book is in the grandly simple manner, a veritable little saga.

Mr. Grace is an Irishman who, when a young man, shipped for Auckland in medical charge of troops. The Maori War was beginning when he landed, and, taking the place of a brother medical officer who wished to stay at home and continue his courtship, he was ordered to the front with the 65th. In an undress staff frockcoat he paraded with the regiment. The Brigade-Major, mounted on a rough ten-pound animal, picked out the dandy stranger. "He rode straight at me, pulled his horse on his haunches, swung him a bit to the left, and shouted out: 'You think yourself a swell, sir. I am Brigade-Major Slack. You are going to Taranaki. Tell Colonel Gold, sir, he is bitching the whole war. As for Colonel Murray, I shall have him broke, sir, I shall have him broke.' He rode off. I smiled, and ranked him a shingle short." The regiment then embarked for New Plymouth. It was not long before the young doctor tasted war. He describes his first impressions:

As soon as the Maori saw our object they opened fire. Our bugles sounded "Take cover." Our men immediately fell flat, crept up anyhow to some gorse hedges, and fired blindly through the fences at anything or nothing. As I lay prone on the ground, clutching absolutely—not figuratively—at the blades of grass, the balls ripped up the sward around me. I first drew in one leg, then another, then tucked in my arm, anon tried to bury my head in my shoulders, or my buttock in my back. It was useless, there was no escape. My soul was frozen within me. My orderly, Corporal Prince, was lying beside me. I knew nothing of his state of mind. The bugle sounded. My heart stood still, then the blood bounded back to my brain.

"What is it, Corporal?"

"Call for the medical officer, sir."

"Malbrouk s'en va-t-en guerre."

An electric flash went through my brain. Have you the courage to neglect your sacred duty? Look in the face of your comrades with the brand of a coward on your heart? No, no! A thousand times no. I arose, alert and smiling. Corporal Prince and I marched with coolness and dignity from one end of the line of skirmishers to the other, almost the only persons exposed to the fire of the enemy. I looked after the wounded without cover and under fire. Now that I had something to do my fear was gone.

And here we return to the author's original purpose: to show what blundering asses we were and what fine fellows the Maori; to show also, as he puts it elsewhere, that the Maori of that time was "a gentleman, a man of superior talent and undoubted courage, who knew more about strategy, fortification, defence and attack, than our army had learned either at Woolwich or in India." Not that Mr. Grace would belittle England; "my sympathies," he says, "are with the Maori, though my affections are all with the British soldier"—that is how the case stands. One of his stories reflects equally charmingly on both his friends:

The chief military duty at that time consisted of outpost work. I noticed that the men of the 40th and 12th regiments came in jaded and weary, whilst the soldiers of the 65th Foot always turned up in the morning fresh and rosy. I was much struck with this difference, which was more marked in rough, wet weather. The temperaments of the men accounted for part of it; but the difference was so glaring I determined to inquire into the cause.

I asked a 65th man for an explanation. He said: "We are on duty to-night. The weather is wet and cold. Come round to our outposts after 'grand rounds' and see for yourself."

I did so. The outposts had been inspected, all orders were given for the night. The officer on duty had retired within the lines. I crept up and was recognised by the men. A soldier near me on sentry called out in a loud, drawing voice: "How are you?"

Immediately, long spun out: "How are you all?" [in Maori] was heard.

The soldier replied: "God save you all."

The Maori replied: "Good, it is the 65th Regiment."

The soldier answered: "Good, it is the Maori."

The Maori said: "Too wet and cold to-night. Let us all go to sleep."

The soldier replied: "All right."

Certain it is there was no firing. Each relied on the other's honour. Had there been any change of policy, the Maori would assuredly have given full notice.

Throughout Mr. Grace insists on the sportsmanlike character of the Maori. They refrained from surprising their enemies on many occasions when massacre was almost invited. During one laborious march for the purpose of storming a pa, or stockade, "the Maori, I think," says Mr. Grace, "were in the neighbouring scrub smoking their pipes and laughing at us. I do not in the least wonder they did not fire. First, our men were like a lot of children out blackberrying; second, the Maori had built three lovely pas and they wanted us to have a look at them." Also, and this is delicious, "they were just as anxious to see the big guns in action as we were."

One warrior, taken prisoner at the attack on Kaharamaea, was visited by General Cameron in hospital. Mr. Grace, who was in charge, described his career.

I said: "General, this is a most extraordinary man. He has received two gunshot wounds, his thigh has already been amputated, and his arm is in danger; he has had the bayonet thrust into his body seven times, and received four sabre wounds in the head. Look at him now; smoking his pipe as tranquilly as a baby sucking a bottle."

The interpreter interpreted all I had said to the Maori. He nodded his head, and smiled in a sweet and gentle manner.

The general's eye moistened, and he became a little pale.

"In the name of God," he exclaimed, "why did you resist our advance? Could you not see we were in overwhelming force?"

The Maori replied: "What would you have us do? This is our village, these are our plantations. Men are not fit to live if not brave enough to defend their own homes."

The general looked abashed. "At any rate," he said, "I am glad to see you are now well treated. Have you any complaints to make?"

"No . . . By the way, yes. Whilst I was lying wounded on the ground, and after a soldier had given me a drink, an officer came up and sabred me."

"That is not according to the usages of war."

"That is a slave's work."

The general turned purple and swore an oath. "I'll cashier him. Would you know the man?"

"Yes. I was a little flurried, but I would know the man."

There was a great turmoil in the camp; hot and fevered inquiries. Presently a colour-sergeant marched in, holding a drummer-boy by the ear. The boy was marched up opposite the Maori, who continued to smoke and gazed at him intently.

"Is that the officer?"

"Yes," said the Maori, "that is he."

The interpreter explained that the youth was a drummer-boy, and his sword was only a toy.

"Do not say any more about it," quoth the Maori.

"Boys must be boys. We train our sons in the same way."

This man was again taken prisoner. "What?" said Mr. Grace, "in arms again?" "Yes," he said; "what would you have a man do? He must stand by his own people." The man was imprisoned, with some hundred and twenty others, in a hulk anchored outside Wellington Harbour. One night, during a gale, the waves broke over her. This was the Maori's chance; they slid through the porthole, one by one, and swam and drifted to Nghawranga, four miles distant, taking it in turns to support their aged chief. Five succumbed, but not the one-legged hero. This escape was the last episode in the war. The Maori, says Mr. Grace, were never conquered; they realised that a kingdom in which the white man should be subject to themselves was impossible, and they therefore ceased fighting.

The Persian Poet of Wisdom.

The Gulistan, or Rose-Garden, of Sadi. Translated by Sir Edwin Arnold. (Thomas Bursleigh.)

WHAT is the reason that versions of Eastern poets seldom justify to an English reader the great reputation of the originals? Sir Edwin Arnold is peculiarly qualified for such a task, both by his knowledge of the East and its languages, and by his very considerable achievement as an original poet: he has chosen for his experiment one of the greatest poets of Persia, a country renowned for poets. Yet it is probable that after getting through one of these "Babs," or gateways, the English reader will turn for solace to another Bab, by one W. S. Gilbert. Partly, no doubt, it is the insistent obtrusion of certain Eastern formulæ, which produces ultimately an almost ludicrous and altogether tedious effect in English. Partly it is that we do not relish continual moralities; nor is the apologue, with its tagged-on lesson, a favourite form with us. Partly, also, something is due to the forms of verse adopted in rendering Eastern poetry. Probably Sir Edwin would say he used the metres which had the nearest correspondence with those of the original. But a translator should surely consider likewise what is the effect of a metre in English; and the effect of his metres is to us trivial and unworthy of the subject-matter.

Aye, shikam! ignoble belly, content thyself with a cake, Lest thy better, the manly backbone, with shameful bending should break!

Such verse is not merely undignified, but perilously akin to doggerel. Yet the substance is strong and well-turned, worthy of a graver metric form.

Briefly, the book consists of a series of moral anecdotes in prose, the lesson of which is driven home by aphorisms in verse. It is full of shrewd reflection, mingled often with deep wisdom, and its ethical standard is very high. The Bab, or section devoted to Darweeshes, contains the loftiest morality, rising often to spirituality of a very striking kind, applicable to all religions which profess a supernatural and ascetic element. That entitled The Manners of Kings has perhaps the most shrewdness. As an example, take the anecdote of the cheater of the poor, who was warned by a wise man that punishment would follow. Being burned out of his house by an accident, he asks whence the flames have come. The wise man, being present, answers: "From the fire of the burning hearts of the poor they came!"

Beware of the smoke that from souls doth part,
For the flame will burst from the ashes at length!
Wrong not too deeply one human heart,
For a sigh to o'erturn the world hath strength!

The stories are always apposite, and show a man of wide and varied experience, who has thought deeply on what he has seen: for Sadi was an indefatigable traveller. And one can understand that many of the aphorisms, in grave and deftly-turned verse, would have for a Persian the memorability of the aphorisms of Shakespeare or Pope. But in English, and in their present form, they will leave our native makers of aphorisms secure.

"His hand moves always in radiance of Blessing."

Bernardino Luini. By G. C. Williamson, Litt.D. "The Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture." (Bell.)

THE new series of "Great Masters" has at least two advantages over its predecessor, the "Great Artists," to which reference has already been made in the columns of the ACADEMY. One is in the illustrations. Instead of a few meagre cuts from engravings, we are treated to a liberal number of reproductions from admirable photographs, many of them taken for the first time for the purpose of the series. In the case of the present volume on Luini these amount to forty, including a photogravure frontispiece, and nearly all are excellent. The only exceptions are such large compositions as the Lugano "Passion," which cannot possibly be reproduced to good effect on so small a scale. In these cases details—such as, for instance, the Magdalene figure in the "Passion"—would have been better. The other advantage is in the topographical list of all known works by, or ascribed to, the painter dealt with. These are something after the fashion of those in Mr. Berenson's well-known volumes; but they are accompanied by full descriptions of the composition and colouring of a majority of the pictures, for which Mr. Berenson does not find room. We are not sure, however, that the text of Dr. Williamson's volume is quite as good as its trimmings. In the case of Luini a biography, properly so called, is out of the question. Vasari neglects him, and the only material available consists of a few dates on the pictures, a few traditions, a few documents disinterred from archives of the convents where he worked. Properly, then, the treatment should resolve itself into a critical essay, and with such a name we can hardly dignify the series of somewhat disjointed, though occasionally interesting, notes which Dr. Williamson puts before us. There is endless description and endless comment, but a whole Luini fails to disengage himself. Two types of modern art criticism find admirable examples in two quotations which Dr. Williamson gives. Mr. Ruskin says of Luini: "Every touch he lays is eternal; every thought he conceives is beautiful and pure, his hand moves always in radiance of blessing; from day to day his life enlarges in power and in peace; it passes away cloudlessly, the starry twilight remaining arched far against the night." And Morelli says: "His forms are round and somewhat heavy, the feet usually too long and the hands too broad and large, eyes long and narrow, and lips protruding." Dr. Williamson tries to combine the Ruskinian and Morellian spirits, but in his heart, we take it, he is Morellian. And with the utmost respect for Morelli and for his methods, we must confess some dismay at the light-hearted fashion in which his pupils bandy about their ascriptions of pictures to this artist and that. What, for instance, is the value of such a note as this on the "Herodias' Daughter" at Vienna?—"In the collection of the Grand Duke William, and then ascribed to Leonardo. Morelli attributed this to Solario, but we consider it is the work of Luini." No reasons are given, and, indeed, Dr. Williamson too often fails to give reasons for his attributions, which thus sink to the level of mere guesses. Moreover, he is inconsistent. On one page he tells you that the "La Columbina" at Dorchester House is a copy; on another, speaking of the various versions of the same picture, he says: "The two at St. Petersburg and Dorchester House we distinctly assign to Luini." Finally, and worst of all, he makes his attributions from photographs. He can never have seen the "La Columbina" at St. Petersburg, because he has never been there. We know that he has never been there, because he says of the St. Sebastian in the same gallery: "We have not seen this picture, and cannot, therefore, dogmatise upon its origin." "Therefore" is good.

Other New Books.

A FURTHER STUDY OF OTHELLO. BY WALKER GIVEN.

THIS is a somewhat egregious contribution to Shakesperian scholarship. Mr. Given, like some other of his countrymen, has the racial antagonism between white and black upon his brain, and believes that Shakespeare and the Elizabethan audiences had it too. He tries to find therein a totally unnecessary key to the tragedy of Othello. The marriage of Othello and Desdemona, he says, was not a "miscegenation" but a "non-somatic union." Othello pledged himself before the Senate that this should be so, and in those abnormal conditions is to be found the secret of his unreasonable and morbid jealousy. This amazing theory is expounded at tedious length, and with considerable ingenuity in misinterpreting plain English and in finding out subtleties where none exist. We have re-read the play with Mr. Given's views in our mind, and are assured that there is nothing in them. After all, Shakespeare was not Ibsen. The difficulties which Mr. Given conceives his explanation to wipe away exist only in his own imagination, and the evolution of the plot is quite intelligible and straightforward without any such motive as he suggests. Moreover, the repulsion of sex between white man and negro, which doubtless exists, had certainly not become self-conscious in the sixteenth century; and if it had, it could not have affected the relations of Othello and Desdemona, for a Moor is not a negro, as Shakespeare probably knew very well. He is, of course, so far as physiological relations go, a member of the Caucasian or Mediterranean group, and not of the negro group. Mr. Given has, therefore, based an offensive superstructure on a non-existent foundation. (Kegan Paul.)

THE TUTTLEBURY TROUBLES. BY W. CARTER PLATTS.

THIS, as its title makes clear, is a work of humour, Tuttlebury belonging to the same genus of comic name as Spoffkins. Mr. Tuttlebury—Erasmus Tuttlebury—who has already been made the hero of the Tuttlebury Tales, is here shown in various predicaments. He learns the bicycle, he endeavours to intimidate a Scotch heifer, he visits a fashionable milliner's, and so forth. Mr. Platts seems to us to owe a great deal to the American writer who created a sardonic domestic experimentalist and tyrant named Spoopendyke, whose merits have never been sufficiently recognised, and of whom Mr. Tuttlebury is but the pale reflection. But this fact does not interfere in the least with the fun of the present work, which, for such festive occasions as smoking concerts, is as well adapted to keep the audience merry as anything we have seen for some time. There is something in one of Mr. Jerome's volumes very like Mr. Platts's dedication to his pipe. (Digby, Long & Co. 3s. 6d.)

THE ARMIES OF THE WORLD. BY C. S. JERRAM.

Under this title Mr. Jerram offers a handy and concise guide to the fighting strength of the nations, so that anyone spoiling for a battle may easily make his choice of an enemy. Information concerning the Transvaal is, of course, the most interesting at the present moment. According to Mr. Jerram, the country upon which we are meditating attack has a war strength of 26,500 burghers, 14,200 of whom are between eighteen and thirty-five years of age. "The State Artillery is the nucleus of the armed forces. It has been re-organised since 1895. It must always be ready to march. The corps comprises a colonel, 109 other officers and N.C.O.s, 226 artillerymen, 28 apprentice telegraphists, &c. The large number of officers is for training purposes. . . . The number of guns is only approximately known. It is not less than the following:—Six light and six heavy Krupp guns, four light and two heavy quick-firing guns, one rifled muzzle-loading gun, one machine gun." There are also several volunteer corps. The Orange Free State permanent troops consist of eighty field artillerymen. The reserve for this force consists of 400 men. The number of men liable to serve is 20,000. Strategy, says Mr. Jerram in his introduction, is still what it was. "Could Cæsar return to lead the armies of France or Germany, his aims and objects, and the principles underlying those aims and objects, would still be those of the Gallic War." The arrangement of the book is orderly, and Mr. Jerram has not wasted words; but it is, of course, impossible to say to what extent his information is accurate. For instance, at the present moment the condition of the Transvaal forces is certainly very different from that given in the account which we have quoted. (Lawrence & Bullen.)

THE SOTERIOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY PROF. W. PORCHER DU BOSE.

THE new edition of Dr. Du Bose's Soteriology is distinguished from that of 1892 mainly by a preface. In this is indicated his line of defence against certain critics who in the chapter on the human personality of Christ, and particularly in the use of the phrase itself, found matter of offence. At first sight it would seem to imply the severance of Christ into two persons; and Mr. Gladstone, while professing himself satisfied that it was used "with no evil intent," affixed to it a note which may be taken, perhaps, as equivalent to the technical "scandalous." The confessed inadequacy of the words "person" and "substance" to the mysteries they are used to enshrine is Dr. Du Bose's principal defence. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE SPIRIT AND THE INCARNATION.

BY THE REV. W. L. WALKER.

It is not easy—and the attempt savours of audacity—in a few lines to summarise and, however superficially, to criticise a book that represents the serious thought and labour of twenty-five years. In these pages is traced the path by which an earnest Scots parson believes himself to have hewn his way back to orthodox Christianity. We say believes himself, because, with the best will in the world, we cannot see that he is there. The doctrine of the Primitive Church, as formulated by the Council of Nicea and ever since accepted by East and West, is that Jesus is "God of God . . . begotten before the ages." Mr. Walker teaches that the Incarnation is a process carried forward by the Holy (or ethical) Spirit and consummated in Christ; who "had to realise His Divine-human manhood through constant receptiveness of and obedience to the Spirit which was the Divine principle within Him." This should mean that it is as an Incarnation of the Holy Spirit that He is the Son of God; which, with regard to the Divine Persons, is absolutely to turn upside down all the traditions of two thousand years.

The full truth of the Incarnation is that God has in Christ manifested His life of Sonship in human form, which was our life in its truth, and was therefore the "Son of man," and manifested His life in that human form which, divested of the flesh, He retains for ever, and in which we see the possibility and behold the image of our own eternal life in God. It was the one God and Father in Christ by His Holy Spirit, as He is in us all, but in Him organically as the result of the whole Divine working in the world to that end, and so completely possessed by Him that the human was entirely one with the Divine.

The book is not all as difficult as this; but seeing that the author introduces the passage with a phrase that suggests a formal summing-up, it seems right to quote it. In its class Mr. Walker's work is of real importance; and it may be hoped that out of its learned and thoughtful pages many readers for whom the older definitions have lost their significance will draw comfort and inspiration. (T. & T. Clark.)

Fiction.

The Patroness. By G. M. George.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

THIS novel might have had for sub-title, "The Story of a Lie." Mr. George, with much real ingenuity, compels an uncommonly conscientious heroine to tell a lie:

Not a little place at Tooting,
But a country-house with shooting
And a ring-park, deer-park lie.

Her behaviour, however, subsequent to the act of lying, does not convince. It is difficult to believe that a girl would break off her engagement, even to a vicar, because she had been driven to confess to him an untruth which she had uttered to another person, and which did not in the least concern her lover. The circumstances were these. Margaret, through the sudden death of her father, became patron of a Welsh living. She knew her father's desires, but, from the highest motives, she ignored these desires, and offered the parish to a client of her own, telling Mr. Morris, whom her father had favoured, that she did not consider him a fit person to have the cure of souls. Afterwards she discovered that her father had written a letter offering the living to Mr. Morris, but had expired before posting it. Questioned by Morris as to the existence of such a document, she deliberately denied it. Here occurred the lie. It was a lie large, but entirely unimportant. No issue whatever depended upon it. The fact of its unimportance mars the book. It makes the book unimportant by making its theme trivial. To the world The Patroness will not be of the first interest. It is commonplace. It is not lifted out of the rut of daily existence as we all see it. Individuality is lacking. But the book has merit. Mr. George develops a theme with skill, and he possesses that mysterious quality usually described as a "gift for narrative." His pictures of the religious and social manners of a small town, though they may not be inspiring, are beyond doubt faithful and honestly realistic.

The book has another fault: it is too long. The author has yet to learn how to leave out. Here is an example of numerous unnecessary things left in:

In spite of the large congregation, there was a distinct want of heartiness in the service, and a comparatively small number joined in the responses. Evidently prayer was not considered an important part of worship, even praise was a mere accessory, to be joined in according to the humour or the musical powers of the worshipper. But no sooner had the preacher ascended the pulpit steps than every face looked animated, and when the short collect was finished the people seated themselves afresh as if the interest of the day were to begin; figuratively speaking, the curtain had been raised; they neither coughed nor spat, they were wrapt in eager attention.

In a quiet and impressive manner the preacher gave out the text: "And they took Absalom, and cast him into a great pit in the wood, and laid a very great heap of stones upon him."

Already in the first lesson for the day he had read out the passage in his sonorous bass voice, so there was no need to spoil the effect by giving out chapter and verse. He simply repeated the tragic words with even greater emphasis, and, after a short pause, began:

"My brethren, this is an age of license, of revolt, of lawlessness; we see it on all sides. This spirit of rebellion, this chafing against authority, is poisoning our country's blood, is extending itself into every corner of the land, affecting every class, robbing of their sacredness the very names of father and of mother, destroying the happiness of the hearth, desecrating our sanctuaries, undermining the stability . . ."

The sermon continues for pages. This is the second instance which we have encountered during the last few days of a novelist giving a "full note" of a sermon. The practice is not one to be encouraged.

A Name to Conjure With. By John Strange Winter.
(F. V. White & Co. 6s.)

OUR acquaintance with the work of Mrs. Stannard is by no means complete, but we think we are correct in saying that A Name to Conjure With marks a departure in her productions. There is throughout the story plain evidence of an intention to be truthful and to abandon the prettiness of sentimentality. Further, the book is strongly imagined, and it is just this imaginative strength—rarest of all qualities in fiction and every other art—which, with its sincerity, atones in a large measure for the novel's numerous shortcomings. The writing is careless and vulgar, and the special pity of this is that Mrs. Stannard has a natural gift for good, unaffected, vigorous English. The theme is trite, and has been treated over and over again. The characters are literary people: our experience of "literary" novels almost moves us to lay down a rule that authors and journalists should never figure in fiction. Mrs. Stannard's heroine is a lady who, from writing tales for servants and shop-girls, springs suddenly into fame as the author of a really great novel. Mrs. Lessingham (the "name to conjure with") and her husband have hitherto been poor. Their income is now multiplied, but they spend proportionately, and Mr. Lessingham is an invalid, and so the famous lady-novelist must continue to work hard. One day she comes to a dead stop, takes a glass of Green Chartreuse, and proceeds forward with colours flying. That is the beginning of the Chartreuse habit. The rest of the book is the history of her declension to the condition of a secret drunkard, living two lives, presenting one face to her husband and the world, and another to herself in that study where rows of liqueur bottles lay in a locked cupboard.

Yes, it is very trite, this theme. And Mrs. Stannard is sometimes strangely wrong in her details of fact concerning the fiscal side of literature. We should like to know, for instance, how an author who is content to sell all serial rights of a four-thousand word story for thirty-five pounds could keep up a household with a wage-list alone of four hundred a year. Mrs. Lessingham would have got at least sixty or seventy pounds for a story. The specimens of reviews and the remarks as to the attitude of the best magazines are also, to be frank, absurd. Yet the sheer imagination which is brought to bear on the domestic, the artistic, and the spiritual existence of this hard-driven woman is such that minor faults, whether of taste or of accuracy, do not seriously count. The book is, when you have cut into the marrow of it, sound, strong, and convincing; it is convincing even in its "happy" conclusion.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

LITTLE NOVELS OF ITALY. BY MAURICE HEWLETT.

Five short stories by the author of The Forest Lovers. The titles: "Madonna of the Peach-Tree," "Ippolita in the Hills," "The Duchess of Nona," "Messer Cino and the Live Coal," and "The Judgment of Borsio." All have appeared in periodicals. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

ON TRIAL. BY "ZACK."

The first long novel by the author of Life is Life, reprinted from Blackwood. A dramatic, tragic love story of Devonshire folk. Though this is longer than her previous tales, there is no falling off in "Zack's" tenseness. (Blackwood. 6s.)

GILIAN THE DREAMER. BY NEIL MUNRO.

This is the story which the author of John Splendid has been contributing to Good Words under the title "The Paymaster's Boy." "What boy's this?" said the General, looking at Gilian with surmising eyes. "He puts me in mind of—of—of an old tale somewhere with a sunny day in it." A pretty story, of a poetical, sensitive visionary cast among old soldiers. (Isbister. 6s.)

EVEN IF.

By J. MORGAN DE GROOT.

The sequel to the same author's story A Lotus Flower. At the end of that work, Hilda, driven from her husband Emile by his "cold intellectuality," and driven from her friend Gerard by his too passionate ardour, disappears to start life afresh. This book takes up the story at that point. Hilda is found in Stockholm in the first chapter. The same wistful, poetical feeling permeates the new book. (Blackwood. 6s.)

MIRANDA OF THE BALCONY.

By A. E. W. MASON.

A new novel by the author of The Courtship of Morrice Buckler. Mr. Mason's crowded narrative has good old-fashioned chapter headings. Chapter III., for instance, treats of a gentleman with an agreeable countenance, and of a woman's face in a mirror"; Chapter IX., "Shows the use which a blind man may make of a dark night"; Chapter XIX., "Tells of Charnock's wanderings in Morocco, and of a walnut-wood door." (Macmillan. 6s.)

A CORNER OF THE WEST.

By E. H. FOWLER.

Miss Fowler is the sister of the author of A Double Thread, and this is her first full-grown novel, although she has written stories for children. It is a quiet, pretty, sympathetic tale of simple people, with incidental "Fowlerisms." Thus: "Once an acquaintance always an acquaintance, like clergymen and mortgages; but I thought that acquaintances sometimes grew into friends, just as thirty years ago I thought that ponies grew into horses." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

A LOST LADY OF OLD YEARS.

By JOHN BUCHAN.

Another "auld Highland story," by the author of John Burnet of Burns. Mr. Buchan, in a dedication strangely reminiscent of the dedication of Stevenson's Kidnapped, describes his period as "the bleak side of the '45." Old friends figure in these pages—Lord Lovat and Murray of Broughton among them. The lost lady is Murray's wife. (Lane. 6s.)

A CORNER OF ASIA.

By HUGH CLIFFORD.

A new volume in the Overseas Library. Mr. Clifford's sub-title describes the book as "Tales and Impressions of Men and Things in the Malay Peninsula," on which his books In Court and Kampong and Studies in Brown Humanity prove him an authority. "The Death March of Kulop Sumbing," "The Vigil of Pa' Túa, the Thief"—these are two of the stories. (Unwin. 2s.)

THE SHADOW OF THE BEAR.

By HEADON HILL.

"A man riding a bicycle turned out of the comparative seclusion of Curzon-street and steered, in one unflinching curve, into the thick of the Piccadilly traffic. The action in itself betokened self-confidence and nerve, and the possession of those qualities was further suggested by the rider's clear grey eyes." That is the beginning, and the practised reader knows that the rider is to pass through perils unnumbered and come out "on top." It is so. The Bear is, of course, Russia. (Pearson. 3s. 6d.)

THE HEIRESS OF THE SEASON.

By SIR WILLIAM MAGNAY.

A passage from Sydney Smith serves as the novelist's motto: "I have got into all my London feelings, which come to me immediately I pass Hyde Park Corner. I am heartless, selfish, indolent, worldly and frivolous. Pardon the vices inevitable in the greatest of cities." The story is of London society to-day. On page 312, Jock and Maud forswear for ever horse-couping noblemen, touting honourables, looting dowagers, and all flashy acquaintances. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THE PATTEN EXPERIMENT.

By MARY E. MANN.

"How does a man and his family live on eleven shillings a week?" was the question which the Rev. Eustace Patten and his wife Rica and certain other young people set out to answer practically by starting the Patten experiment. How they succeeded is explained in this pleasant comedy by the author of The Cedar Star. (Unwin. 6s.)

THE RED RAG OF RITUAL.

By GEORGE CUSACK.

A story for the times. In the first chapter a street child and a ritualistic priest confer. "I should think God likes Catholics," she remarks, "'cos they give Him pretty things. I should." "Being a Catholic isn't all pretty things," he said; "there are hard things too." The child becomes the heroine of the book, and prevents the Rev. Francis Philmore from going over to Rome. To such as are interested in points of ceremony and creed it should be fascinating. (Warne. 6s.)

SELLCUTS' MANAGER.

By MRS. ORMISTON CHANT.

Sellcuts was a music-hall, and its manager was Mr. Paul Blake, gentleman and philanthropist. Mrs. Ormiston Chant, whose views on the proper control of music-halls are well known, has apparently written this story (just as Sir Walter Besant wrote All Sorts and Conditions of Men) to bring the model house of entertainment nearer. A vivacious, good-humoured, free-and-easy book. (Richards. 6s.)

NELL GWYN'S DIAMOND.

By I. HOOPER.

A story of adventure and peril, by the author of His Grace o' th' Gunne and The Minister's Conversion. As to the present resting-place of Nell Gwyn's diamond opinions differ. Some say it is in the possession of the Jesuits; some that a shrine in Spain harbours it; a certain V.C. declares that it decorates an idol in the Punjab. In the present spirited volume it leads Mr. Aysgarth a very entertaining dance. (Black. 6s.)

THE GREATEST GIFT.

By A. W. MARCHMONT.

The greatest gift is, of course, "a woman's heart; the heart of her I loved." A somewhat melodramatic story, with a pretty ending. The part of beneficent disentangler is played by the kindly editor of the Middlesbrough Evening News—a new position for the Fourth Estate. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

UNDER THE SJAMBOK.

By G. H. RUSSELL.

This is timely, for it is a tale of adventure in the Transvaal. "'Yes, mister,' said Solomon [after Babijan had been shot], 'e was a good old feller in spite of his black skin, so we'll find a 'ole to put 'im in.' In less than ten minutes an ant-bear hole held all that remained of the once feared and mighty witch-doctor. A big stone was rolled across the mouth, and we then descended into the valley of the great Letaba river." (Murray. 6s.)

A CRIMSON CRIME.

By G. MANVILLE FENN.

Mr. Fenn is always spirited, brisk, and sensational. All his qualities are again in full force here. After the second inquest Oliver's innocence is established, and the wedding lends joy to the last page. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

SHAMS.

ANONYMOUS.

This work, which is dedicated "to those who might make society a better thing than it is," supplies a hectic picture of the sinfulness of certain artistic London sets. The central sinner is Lord Edensor. He talks like this: "Twenty—the age of hopes and dreams and possibilities. You can adore Beauty in a garret. Not all the silken tissues or gorgeous jewels of the East are worth her exquisite nudity. . . ." and so forth. A silly book. (Greening. 3s. 6d.)

THE BROWN GIRLS.

By R. NEISH.

Thirteen tales and sketches, light and flippant, by the author of The Others. (Arrowsmith. 1s.)

A Forgotten Notable Novel.

I do not now remember the date of the appearance of My Trivial Life and Misfortune. It was recommended to me as a clever book, and I found it a great deal more. So lasting was the impression it left upon me that I have constantly wondered ever since how it came to have no successor. True, Poor Nellie followed it, but at such an immense intellectual distance that I could with difficulty be induced to accept it as a work of the same author. The long silence of "A Plain Woman" leads me to conclude that she gave us all herself in the striking story of her misfortune and trivial life. Sainte-Beuve once said, inaccurately, that every woman has a novel in her. Neither the average woman nor the average man has any such thing. For the most part we are docile sheep, who neither perceive where we are going nor whither we have gone, nor what we have done, nor what we expect to do. The blows of fate fell us; but generally we are incapable of shaping our experiences in perspective. Unhappily the vast majority nowadays has betaken itself to fiction, and we are flooded with cheap and vulgar trash which means nothing, introduces us to no character worth knowing, does not help us to make new friends as the creative fiction of old did, adds no new personality to our museum, tells us no tale we are not ready to forget with the last page.

Jane Austen's women, George Meredith's women and many of his men, Thackeray's men and some of his women, Dickens's men, Scott's men and women, Turgenev's and Balzac's men and women—all these are persons we know, remember, and gladly welcome at any time. Of whose creations among the modern novelists, clever and successful as they may be, can one say so much? Stevenson's style is ever a delight, the man himself most charming; but what character of serious and lasting value has he given us? He has given us himself athwart his work, and it is much; but he has not added a solid man or woman, unless we except Allan Breck, to our gallery of portraits in fiction.

Now the claim I lay for My Trivial Life and Misfortune is precisely the merit of being written upon the plan which every reading of new fiction proves to me is the best. I cannot predict what the future novelist may hold in store for the surprise and delight of the readers who will succeed us; but this I do know about the present—the popular novelists of the day never introduce us to a single character whom we succeed in knowing and understanding, we succeed in detesting or loving, like personal acquaintances. The present-day popular novelists' sole preoccupation is to write clever things about their characters, and as a rule they mistake flippancy, vulgarity, and obscurity for cleverness. Instead of making us see how the men and women they write about saw, their concern is to show us how they see such men and women. The result is that we lay down these cheap, unworked, and alarmingly popular new novels with a feeling of depression and time lost, having learnt nothing, having met nobody worth meeting or capable of being remembered, not even having enjoyed a temporary distraction. The distinctive notes of the fiction of the hour are: vulgarity, an absence of literary flavour, and a cheap abuse of smart and trivial dialogue.

Hence the singular individuality of such a book as My Trivial Life and Misfortune. Here is a book written by a lady in the dear old-fashioned sense of the word—a woman who looks at life with the eyes of a retiring, well-bred woman. She brings to this inappreciable quality—that quality which claims sisterhood with the refined and gentle outlook of Jane Austen—a keen sense of humour, a caustic wit, the rare capacity of finding material for observation, and a marvellous art of living in the dullest and most hopeless surroundings. I do not hesitate to call My Trivial Life and Misfortune a great book, a book worthy of a modest place on the shelf of our classical novelists. For these reasons: it is admirably well written, as they used to write in the days when English literature was framed and fashioned; quiet, dignified, not too perfumed or dazzling, without a taint of epigram: it is not clever writing, it is genuine. How diminishing are those delightful qualities in our literature—genuineness and spontaneity! Unfortunately the author is not an artist, and she lacks charm. Hence her book is far too long, and is crowded with details by no means essential. Much of the conversation—a faithful reproduction of the deadly dull conversation of the dull life she so admirably portrays—might with advantage have been cut down.

There is none of the eloquence, none of the brilliance, the intensity of Charlotte Brontë, none of the delicate wit and enchanting suggestive railery and humour of Jane Austen, none of the large philosophy and wide observation of George Eliot; and yet something of these three great women writers enters into a more ponderous whole, which contains so much less genius than any of the three.

But the fact remains that when you have closed the book you have made several unforgettable acquaintances, mostly, I must admit, of a detestable kind. That the writer takes first rank—in the background, if you will, but still in the first rank—is proven by the fact that we learn to loathe the characters she offers for our loathing, and to ridicule, as we ridicule living persons, those she intends us to ridicule. Where will you find a more hateful snob than Rigardy-Wrenstone? She pursues him remorselessly, and draws him as only a British author can draw that exclusively British genus—the snob. The portrait is a triumph of untutored art. And what pungent wit and humour go to the building up of the figure! No ill-temper, no exasperation, but perfect breeding and a delicious sense of the ridiculous! As portraits, Aunt Jane and the admirable Catherine are quite as good in their way—Aunt Jane, in particular, is a masterly delineation of feminine imbecility and righteousness. We are hardly touched by the tragedy of the poor woman's last years because we are so intensely conscious of her exasperating individuality. She is so real to us that we cannot help a muttered "serves her right" when Nemesis overtakes her and she is punished for her disagreeable righteousness. Such preaching, Bible-quoting unamiability as that of Aunt Jane deserves almost any fate, though one would rather that destiny did not wait until a woman grows old and feeble to punish her. And how restrained the portrait of the admirable Catherine—intriguer, blood-sucker, hypocrite, pseudo-philanthropist, a creature of ferocious, grasping greed! Truly a monument of unlovely British vices, committing crime to Bible quotations in the name of the Lord. As an exposure of the futility of the dull domestic martyrdom of women, of the petty absorption of their minds and souls in a worthless round of duties, of their arid hourly sacrifices, I know nothing more striking.

HANNAH LYNCH.

Two Plays.

"The Devil's Disciple."

It is characteristic of the London stage that Mr. George Bernard Shaw's comedy, "The Devil's Disciple," after having long since proved its quality by a success in America, should be introduced to London at—Kennington. None the less credit, however, to Mr. Murray Carson for producing it. It is a brilliantly bad play. We have sometimes thought that Mr. Shaw writes indefensible plays for the mere fighter's pleasure of defending them; and no doubt when the time comes he will defend this one as he has defended others.

The action of "The Devil's Disciple" passes in New Hampshire during the American War of Independence, 1777. The first act is in the house of the late Timothy Dudgeon. There are present the relict; her elder son, Richard, a bad man (the Devil's disciple); her younger son, a fool; Essie, a bastard of the dead man's brother; Anthony Anderson (the minister) and his wife, Judith; the lawyer, and various relatives. The will is read, and, to the general surprise and disgust, Richard the wicked is named heir. That is all; but the act is masterly from end to end. The right atmosphere is got with firm, simple precision, and every character is admirably sketched. The reading of the will in extenso is contrived with a resourcefulness and a natural aptitude for stagecraft unworthy neither of Ibsen nor of Dumas père. It is a wonderful will; and one is conscious of a desire to have known the testator, who must have been very like his son Richard—a kind heart, a bitter tongue, and the sworn foe of sentimentality and religiosity—a projection, in fact, of "G. B. S."

It is in the second act that Mr. Shaw's waywardness begins. One gradually discovers then that the first act has no bearing on the action whatever, except to introduce the three leading characters—Richard, and the parson and his wife. All this business of the will, these humours of conventional mourning, this elaborate picture of the Dudgeon family, have nothing to do with the play itself. The play starts again. We are at the parson's. British soldiers are about. They find Richard alone with Mrs. Anderson, Mr. Anderson having been called to a pastoral visit, and taking Richard to be the parson they arrest him. Now, arrest is a mere preliminary to death. Richard accepts the situation. Mrs. Anderson accepts it, though she has professed to loathe the man. And when the parson returns he also seemingly accepts it, and departs hurriedly, none knows whither. It will be observed that the plot is trite.

Act III. is in three scenes. In the first, Mrs. Anderson, who believes her husband to be a coward, confesses that Richard's heroism has aroused her love, and Richard astutely repulses her. In the second, Richard is tried by court-martial and sentenced to death. In the third, Richard is within a hundred seconds of being hung when the parson arrives at the head of militia powerful enough to treat with the English, and Richard is set free. This third act is an amazing mixture. The scene between Richard and Mrs. Anderson contains, among other good things, a fine exposition of Richard's motives in allowing himself to die for the minister; but Mrs. Anderson's sudden love for him, so freely expressed, is quite unconvincing. The court-martial is one of the best scenes in the play. The officers, especially General Burgoyne, with his "Let me persuade you to be hanged," are superb. Nevertheless, the court-martial is inexcusable. For it is farce, brilliant farce which continually boils over with marvellous wit and humour, but still farce, and utterly out of harmony with the rest of the play—cast in a different mould, composed in a different key. The scene of execution is feeble. It should have been thrilling, but Mr. Shaw was too much occupied with being funny to attend to the dramatic opportunities of the situation. The conclusion is just like comic opera, and one feels the need of Offenbach's strains as the curtain falls.

To sum up, the first act is comedy of the highest order, but it might have been omitted. The second scene of the third act is farce of the highest order, but it should be rewritten as comedy. The rest of the play is by turns weak, sublime, infantile, clever, and incomprehensible. Motives are not clearly exposed, and characters are not consistent. The parson, for example, is quite a model and unexceptionable parson in the first act, but in the second he is for ever talking like "G. B. S." "The Devil's Disciple" is the least satisfactory play of Mr. Shaw's which we have read or seen, except "Widowers' Houses." It is inferior to "Arms and the Man" and to everything in Plays, Pleasant and Unpleasant. But it is not a piece to be ignored. It comprises Mr. Shaw's worst, and his best also. To see the first act and come away is to come away with the impression that Mr. Shaw is the dramatist of the future. To stay is to feel that he may never be anything else.

"The Moonlight Blossom."

If for nothing else, Mr. C. B. Fernald's "The Moonlight Blossom," produced at the Prince of Wales's Theatre by Mr. Forbes Robertson and Mrs. Patrick Campbell, deserves notice because it breaks the terrible circle of insularity in which nearly all our plays are enclosed. It gives a new atmosphere, awakens a dormant set of sensibilities—like Maeterlinck; and therefore we must be grateful, not only to Mr. Fernald, but to those who have the courage to perform his piece before an audience necessarily uncomprehending and apathetic. The production of it is an effort in the cause of dramatic art, not an appeal to the box-office. But it is by no means a good play. It is not even as good a play as we had the right to expect from Mr. Fernald. Mr. Fernald wrote "The Cat and the Cherub," a melodrama clumsy, crude, amateurish, but interesting and remarkable. "The Cat and the Cherub" was in the best sense dramatic, and it evoked that unmistakable frisson in the theatre which only a genuine dramatist is capable of evoking. But though it was dramatic, it was nothing else. Now, "The Moonlight Blossom" has several virtues, but it is not dramatic. Given the theme, it is neatly enough constructed. The dialogue is admirable in its appropriateness, simplicity, and real literary beauty; and there is quaint wit in it. Bummavashi, the boastful drunkard, says: "I am powdered with the dust of maidens' wings. For me women have forsaken their young." But when we have praised the dialogue, and appreciated the charm of the decorations and costumes (due to Mr. Alfred Parsons, A.R.A.), we have finished with esteem. The basis of the plot is feebly melodramatic—not at all, to our thinking, distinctively Japanese, but something "Adelphic" expressed in terms of Japanese law and custom. Nor has Mr. Fernald apparently made any sustained attempt to portray the Japanese spirit. No one who has spent even a single intimate evening with some of the numerous Japanese who come to London to learn English applied art and English shipbuilding could be for a moment under the illusion that Mr. Fernald had given us Japan. "The Moonlight Blossom," spiritually, is no more Japanese than the Japanese umbrellas in Regent-street. It is something between East and West—as though England and Japan had met on arid Perim and manufactured a concoction utterly foreign to both. Possibly this fact, possibly the fact that the theme is essentially weak and artificial, accounts for the dulness which pervades much of the play. There you have it: despite its literary charm and the freshness of certain aspects of it, "The Moonlight Blossom" is apt to be tedious. All that intelligent acting could do was done.

Things Seen.

Parker's Immortality.

THE cottage garden was an orchard in miniature, and the size and bloom of the fruit proclaimed the excellence of the stock and the care with which the trees had been tended.

"Your fruit looks very well," I remarked to the old woman.

"Yes, they're good trees," she answered, speaking eagerly, as gossips will with a stranger to whom all their thoughts are new. "My husband taught me fruit farming. He's been dead eleven years. I shall be seventy-nine next March, and I was married fifty years ago. No, I've never lived anywhere else. We came straight here on the day I was married, and my husband planted all these trees the same year. My husband was head gardener to old Mr. Chesham, the father of the young gentleman who's lodging in the next cottage, so he knew all about fruit farming. Sometimes I think I ought to have travelled more. I've never been further than Hastings. Oh, yes, I manage all right. I sell the fruit. It's good selling fruit. There are some ladies in Hastings give me nine shillings a bushel for those Blenheim Oranges. And then I bake bread for the hoppers. My husband's mother taught me to bake. He persuaded her to stay a week here and teach me. My husband was a great one for learning and teaching. Then there's Mr. Chesham—that's a help to me. He always comes here during the hopping season. He's a literary gentleman. He often talks of my husband. He says the best part of his writing is the bits about the country, and he often says to me: 'Mrs. Parker, that's due to your husband. He made me love the country, and taught me all I know about it.' We have long talks in the evening, sometimes. Mr. Chesham doesn't need to make any money. When I ask him why he sits writing and writing all day, he says because he wants to be remembered after he is dead. It may be all very well for writing folk to want to do good to people after they are dead, but it's quite enough for me to get through the day without thinking what's going to happen to other people after I'm dead and buried. I put my shoulder out last winter—fell down them steps—and that makes me a bit slow. I've got as much as I can do without thinking of who comes after me. Did you see the text hanging on the wall of Mr. Chesham's room. My niece painted it for him. I wanted her to choose something from the Bible, but Mr. Chesham chose that about leaving a memory behind him. Oh, yes! I get along all right. The hoppers pay a good price for my bread, and the fruit sells well; and there's Mr. Chesham! My shoulder troubles me now and then, but I've got along without help from anybody since my husband died."

Yet, I think, Parker did not wholly die eleven years ago. As I went my way I found myself wondering if, somewhere in the shades, he has yet met that poet who lived eighteen hundred years ago, the poet who wrote

Non omnis moriar; multaque pars mei Vitabit Libitnam.

Memoirs of the Moment.

SCOTLAND, more than ever this season, has been the most highly favoured of nations by visitors. The Queen and her Court are there, and the Prince of Wales, two of his daughters, and his son-in-law are there. The Duke and Duchess of York and their children are there. So are the Duke and Duchess of Connaught and their children, the Princess Henry of Battenberg and hers. The Duke of Cambridge has been there. Mr. Balfour is, as usual, there. Finally, Lord George Hamilton and Lord Selborne, addressing Scottish audiences for the Government, are to have set-offs in Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and Mr. Asquith addressing Scottish audiences on behalf of the Opposition.

THE Dysart Trust, which was set up for twenty-one years from the death of the present Earl's grandfather, came to an end last Saturday, on which day he obtained for the first time full control over his Ham and other estates. Lord Dysart's father, who led a merry life as Lord Huntingtower, did not live to inherit the earldom. In spite of the numerous escapades in which, from time to time, he figured publicly, he was a man of many excellences of heart. Of his generosity, of a sort, there was no doubt; and it has needed the careful management of twenty-one years to pull the property round to anything like its old prosperity. Lord Dysart is the Lord-Lieutenant of the County of Rutland—a distinction he owed certainly not to the size of his property in that minute county, but to the favour of Mr. Gladstone, who had had the pleasure of hailing in the young man a convert from Unionism to Home Rule.

A NICE question in ethics is again raised by the arrest this week of two sailors charged with having committed cannibalism on a raft, after the wreck of their vessel. To take life is not always to commit murder, or the soldier and the hangman were an extinct species. The community has the power of life and death. And what, then, is a community? The definition of it is a matter of some verbal difficulty if it is so worded as to exclude a company of shipwrecked mariners on the high seas. They are isolated from the rest of their kind by barriers more decisive than those that divide most of the countries of Europe from each other. They are their own senate and their own law-makers. If five men must all die unless one dies to give them sustenance; and if all agree and draw lots, and the man who draws doom is immolated, how are the survivors to be regarded by theologians or by lawgivers? Doctors of divinity differ; and the law temporises. Guilty of murder, a jury, not many years ago, found two such hapless culprits, at the direction of Lord Coleridge, who, nevertheless, instantly liberated them.

MR. LOUIS GARVIN has been saying his good-byes this week to the Newcastle Daily Chronicle, prior to his removal to London, where he takes up his appointment on the Daily Telegraph on November 1. "A journalist is a kind of bat who flits by night, and who loses, as the years go by, the friends of the day." So Mr. Garvin, at a farewell dinner in the North the other evening, declared, adding his surprise to find, when the parting-time came, that he had forfeited so few and kept so many. Refusing to accept the praises proper enough to the occasion, Mr. Garvin remarked it was sometimes said that this or that article was from the pen of this or that person, whereas "a paper—a real paper—is the product, not of an individual, but of a corporation." The members of such a staff, said Mr. Garvin, are "flesh of each other's flesh, and blood of each other's blood." In short, a great paper imposes its own traditions on receptive minds. Lord Brougham, when he wrote a whole number of the Edinburgh Review, did not produce a more homogeneous periodical than the Saturday Review of the sixties, done by a score of different hands, and under an editor who himself did not write a syllable.

Correspondence.

Misconceptions.

SIR,—Will you allow me space to endorse every word of the masterly article by "Z" on "The Ineligible Elegy"? Literature has always seemed to me an influence that should be vital in any real education. But, in spite of floods of talk on various "systems" and "schemes," the ordinary school routine remains singularly lacking in either applied psychology, applied sympathy, or applied common sense. While this is so, literature, which dies with drudgery, must suffer many deaths. Often the actual teachers are not to blame, but examiners, head masters, and other "people of importance" are still at their old work of inhibiting natural growth.

Surely it is enough only to mention the "Elegy" to see how apart from all that is boyish the poem is. The very word "elegy" marks it as such. What has a schoolboy to do with elegies? But I have never found that that argument produces any impression.

The truth is, sir, that, besides psychology, the school-master often lacks literary appreciation. What is artificial, what goes by rule, appeals to those to whom rules are as the breath of their nostrils. What is free and nonconforming they instinctively feel to be dangerous to scholastic rectitude.

Now, observe, the boy is at the other pole. He hates rules, he loves what is unrestrained. Hence an eternal antagonism, except in those rare cases where teachers never lose their love of freedom.

But there is a third force acting against school literature—prudery. We must have a young person literature. The great taboo lies on the reading of "Hamlet," of Adam Bede, of David Copperfield, and I have been criticised for giving, as an upper school prize, The Heart of Midlothian. For myself, I think that all this fear for the young person has the reverse of the intended effect. That opens up a wide question. I do not believe in the cleanliness of concealment, and I have never found it practically necessary; but, at any rate, the idea of a young person literature is one barrier to any literature at all.

Still, when all is said, there remains much unexplained perversity in the scholastic selection. Why, for instance, choose "Richard II.," one of the plays least interesting to boys? Why harp on "The Deserted Village," which is as far from personal appeal as is the "Elegy"? Why drill pupil teachers in Cowper and in the prosiest pieces of his work that can be found? I confess I cannot answer these questions. The answers remain among the secrets of the scholastic mind.

What is to be proposed? It seems so obvious, one would have thought, that what is wanted is poetry of action, adventure, life. Only with older boys should occasional (and short) reflective pieces be introduced. These should be varied, for one boy takes to one thing, another to another. I have known boys of fifteen really genuinely enthusiastic over Ben Jonson's "Hymn to Diana," but it has the redeeming qualities of shortness and melody.

All that we need is a little sympathetic psychology, a little common sense, a little literary taste, and the freedom to apply these endowments. Literature and life will then have some organic relationship in the process of growth.—I am, &c.,

MAGISTER.

SIR,—Perhaps these two instances of childish misconception of words may amuse your readers. They are both from well-known hymns:

- (1) Can a mother's tender care
Cease toward the child she bear?

This puzzled me for years. I could never understand why a mother should be particularly tender towards a bear, even if it was a young one and a "she" one.

(2) When the soft dews of kindly sleep.

It seems only the other day that I discovered that "kindly" was not the name of a place where "soft Jews" went to sleep.—I am, &c.,

September 25, 1899.

ERNLEY WALROND.

SIR,—I have heard the following story told apropos of the difficulty to the youthful mind of comprehending Gray's "Elegy." A master who was superintending a boys' reading-class which was working through the poem asked one of his pupils what was the meaning of the line: "The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep." The question was evidently a poser, and it was some time before the answer came: "Four rude old men sleeping in church"!

A little girl with whom I am acquainted recently asked her mother what a "consecrated cross-eye bear" was; the explanation of her query being that she had been learning (orally) a hymn commencing: "A consecrated cross I bear."—I am, &c.,

Benjamin Jowett and Herbert Spencer.

SIR,—Mr. McBain is doing good service in calling the attention of your readers to the unjustifiable statements of the opponents of Herbert Spencer. With regard to the definition of "ancestor-worship" in Chambers's New Dictionary, about which a letter appeared a few weeks ago, it is to be hoped that in the next edition the word "erroneously" will be expunged. To say that "ancestor-worship is supposed by Mr. Spencer to be the foundation of all religion" may be fairly correct: it is for readers of Spencer to judge by the evidence he brings forward whether this is rightly or "erroneously" supposed; and in any case it is not the province of the lexicographer to introduce his private opinions in a definition of this sort.

Mr. McBain's letter in your issue of September 16 opens up wider ground. Dr. Jowett's allusions to Herbert Spencer indicate what the latter himself would probably call a strong classical bias, and they bring up once more the general question of classical versus scientific education. This question has been thoroughly discussed by Mr. Spencer in his work on Education, and it is not necessary to recapitulate the arguments used by him in support of his view that education should be mainly scientific.

It is not to be wondered at that Jowett should look with something like scorn upon Spencer, champion, as he is, of such an opposite system of education and an opposite school of thought to that which Jowett represented. The strong language of Jowett's allusions to this "fellow," fit only to be classed among "repulsive people," shows clearly how an almost exclusively classical education warps the mind. In Jowett's case, the theological bias was also greatly in evidence, and the reverence for authority and tradition cultivated by classical and theological studies combined is sufficient to account for his narrow-mindedness, which resulted in his hurling opprobrious epithets at the heads of those who differed from him. Spencer's own conduct stands out in great contrast. A man who has taken a most prominent part in many controversies, it will be said of him that he was always patient under contumely, and never returned in kind the contemptuous and contemptible language applied to him by many of his opponents.—I am, &c.,

"And Which."

SIR,—In a letter headed "And Which," in your last issue, the writer suggests that the word "and" is not superfluous in such sentences as that instanced by you in the ACADEMY of June 24,* and he gives quotations as showing good authority for its use.

But, surely, the sentences he quotes are not similar in form to those in question?

In Mr. Irving's quotations "and" is used to connect qualifications, the first or the first group expressed by adjectives, the last by a fuller form, to give impressiveness and cadence.—I am, &c., F. A. ALLEN.

September 25, 1899.

SIR,—This "and which" question comes up annually with unfailing regularity, and no one—not even Mr. Andrew Lang, though he has toyed with it—seems able to settle it. May I try to do so? Thus:

Many relative sentences (but, of course, not all) are of an adjectival nature. Regarded as units, these sentences are adjectives in their principal sentences.

If a substantive is qualified by several adjectives immediately following one another, it is proper to put "and" before the last adjective.

Therefore, if a relative sentence is adjectival, and is the last of a series of two or more adjectives or adjectival clauses, it is proper to put "and" before its "which."

Note that, if I am right, your own rule, that "and" is only permissible when the relative is a reiterated one, is not quite broad enough. It would be just as correct to write, with Sir Thomas North,

An army invincible, and which they could not possibly withstand,

as to write

An army which was invincible, and which they could not possibly withstand.

In my opinion, every one of the samples of "and which" given by Mr. C. J. Irving is perfectly justifiable. The sentence from Her Majesty's letter, however—"We are in the midst of a ministerial crisis, and which I am afraid will be followed by others"—is incorrect. No adjective immediately precedes the "and which." Moreover, the relative sentence is not adjectival at all. It comprises a separate statement as to the future, and would have been better cast in the form of a separate principal sentence—"And I am afraid it will be followed by others."

Let me add that an "and" before a reiterated "which" is correct in any case, whether the relative sentence is adjectival or not. Thus: "A ministerial crisis which I attribute to hidden causes and which I am afraid will be followed by others."—I am, &c., E. A. B.

September 25, 1899.

SIR,—The use of et qui without a preceding qui is not only legitimate in French, but it is absolutely necessary in the example cited by your correspondent. In the use of the conjunction is evidently necessary to distinguish the antecedent of qui, which is clearly histoire and not furie.

"C'est une histoire—pleine de fracas et de furie et qui signifie rien"

It is useful to compare a parallel construction:

"Une grâce un peu maniérée et serpentine mais qui séduisant."—Bourget.

E. R. J. GLANVILLE.

Nottingham: Sept. 26, 1899.

* "We are in the midst of a ministerial crisis, and which I am afraid will be followed by others."

Our Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 1—New Series.

LAST week, the time being ripe, we asked for poems of not more than twenty-four lines anticipating the joys of winter. The Rev. T. Constable, Hurstwood, Buxted, has, we think, the best claim to the prize for the following spirited lines (in spite of a Shakespearian "howler" in the third stanza):

OLD OCTOBER.

Hail, old October, bright and chill,
First freedman from the summer sun!
Spice high the bowl, and drink your fill!
Thank heaven, at last the summer's done!

Come, friend, my fire is burning bright,
A fire's no longer out of place,
How clear it glows! (there's frost to-night,
It looks white winter in the face.

You've been to see "King John." You've seen
A noble play: I'm glad you went;
But what on earth does Shakespeare mean
By "winter of our discontent"?

Be mine the Tree that feeds the fire!
Be mine the sun knows when to set!
Be mine the months when friends desire
To turn in here from cold and wet!

The sentry sun, that glared so long
O'erhead, deserts his summer post;
Ay, you may brew it hot and strong:
"The joys of winter"—come, a toast!

Shine on the kangaroo, thou sun!
Make far New Zealand faint with fear!
Don't hurry back to spoil our fun.
Thank goodness, old October's here!

We quote also three others:

WINTER.

Some folks may sigh for summer days,
To laze and dream among the flowers;
Give me old winter's breezy ways,
The north wind's sparkling, frosty hours.

To feel the warm, enkindled blood
Run circling to my glad heart's core,
To say with Schiller "Oh, 'tis good
To be alive!" and wish no more.

To glide along the crispy ice
With newly sharpened, well-cut skates;
Each day to find a new device
For threes and dainty figure eights.

And thro' the woody copse to wend
Our way, hand joined in hand some night
When winter stars to Love's eyes lend
A newer note, a gladder light.

Within the fireside's ingle nook,
So still and quiet as a mouse,
She knitting, I with pipe and book—
My favourite, Angel in the House.

Warmed by the yule-log's cheerful light,
Her words of love will seem more tender,
What memories we'll weave at night!—
Four feet upon a brass-bound fender.

[B. B., Birmingham.]

THE ADVENT OF WINTER.

(With Apologies to Macaulay.)

Blow, blow, O winds of Autumn; beat, beat, O stormy rain.
Let loose the floods, strip bare the woods—King Winter comes again.
Too long we've lain in idleness in Summer's flowery nest,
But from the north he steppeth forth, shall put our powers to test.

The stars have felt his frosty breath: the woods have owned his sway;

They cast aside their summer pride in glorious disarray.
Through leafless aisle and ruined choir his challenging trumpets ring:

"Ho! far and near the lists are clear: who meets the Northern King?"

O Northern King, our walls are stout; we make the threshold fast,
We neither fear thy glittering spear nor wild and stormy blast.
The winds that prowl and prowl around if they may entrance win—
Ho! let them prowl, or let them howl, our hearts beat high within.

The white enchantment of the snow may hold the world in thrall
Without ; within, fantastic flames go flickering up the wall.
The magic of romance is ours ; we are stirred to the old unrest,
And again afire with a strange desire, we follow the wondrous quest.

So all night long we hold the fort, but lo ! at break of day
At the castle gates the champion waits, and we may not say him nay.

His seal is set on every pane, a challenge fair and free :
"Up, up ! arise, and in valiant wise, come buffet a fall with me !"

We come, we come, O Northern King ! Loud, loud thy bugles blow—

The wide and glittering heavens above, the wind-swept earth below.
The joy of battle fills our hearts, and we meet thee face to face
In the wild delight of a stormy fight and the clash of a steeléd embrace.

HER FRIEND MRS. EYRE at DERBY, 1747-1758. Edited by Mrs. RATHBORNE. With Portraits and Facsimiles. 8vo, 10s. 6d.

An entertaining series of letters written, chiefly from London and Windsor, by Lady Jane Coke to her friend, Mrs. Eyre, at Derby. They are good examples of the easy elegance of style of a cultured woman of the period, and afford an excellent insight into the social life of the middle of the eighteenth century. Various well known people are mentioned in them, and amusing accounts are given of the fashions, the news, and the gossip of the day. Lady Jane Coke was eldest daughter of 1st Marquis of Wharton, and sister of Philip, Duke of Wharton. She married Mr. John Holt, of Redgrave, in Suffolk, and secondly Mr. Robert Coke, of Longford, Derbyshire, brother of 1st Earl of Leicester.

BLACKIE'S ILLUSTRATED LATIN SERIES.

GENERAL EDITOR—

Prof. R. Y. TYRRELL, Litt.D.,

Examiner to the Universities of London and Glasgow, &c.

This New Series, issued under the accomplished editorship of Prof. Tyrrell, is distinguished by several important features for the first time introduced into English School Books.

Scope.—The volumes are intended mainly for the middle forms of schools, though the series will also include volumes for junior forms on the one hand, and passmen on the other. Each volume is complete in itself, containing biographical, historical, and (where suitable) critical introductions, texts, notes, appendices, specimen translations and hints on translation, English exercises, and vocabularies. No references are as a rule made to any particular grammar.

Introduction.—The great aim is to make the Introduction thoroughly readable and interesting.

Illustrations.—Most of them drawn specially from the originals, are included, so as to lend interest to the text, and familiarise the pupil with the results of archaeological research. Maps and plans are also provided.

Notes.—The Notes, besides explaining simply all difficulties in style or allusion, aim at interesting the pupil in the subject-matter of the book and in literature as such.

Appendices.—Textual and other criticism beyond the attainments of the average middle-form pupil, but useful to the master, is given in Appendices.

Translations.—Wherever standard literary translations are available a specimen is given; this is specially serviceable in the case of poets. In other cases hints on translation are given.

Exercises.—Each of the prose books contains Exercises for retranslation, carefully compiled, so as to practise the pupil in the vocabulary and the constructions of the text.

Vocabulary.—Each volume has a complete Vocabulary.

Style.—Particular care is devoted to the get-up of the volumes, which are carefully printed and well and tastefully bound.

These five volumes will constitute a survey of the British Empire by the most distinguished and experienced writers upon Imperial interests. Every care has been taken to avoid the dry-as-dust method of statistics, and the articles will be found not only complete and minutely informative, but also attractive in exposition, genial, and eminently readable. It is improbable that so much information of so essential a character has ever been brought together into so small a compass, and the volumes will be found to present a study of the life, resources, and future prospects of the British Empire unparalleled for accuracy, dignity, and charm. Each volume has explanatory maps, so that no detail is omitted that may conduce to a rapid comprehension of the large and fruitful topic under discussion.

By EMILE MICHEL. Translated by ELIZABETH LEE. With 40 Coloured Plates, 40 Photogravures, and about 250 Text Illustrations, 2 vols., Imperial 8vo. £2 2s. net.

The glorious career of Rubens and the splendour and fecundity of his genius combine to make his name one of the greatest in the history of Art. For English readers there is a phase of peculiar interest in his career—his connection with the brief splendours of the Court of Charles I.—and though he is but scantily represented in our national collection, he gave a far-reaching gift to the Art of our country in the person of his favourite pupil, Vandyck.

The Memoirs of Victor Hugo. With a

Preface by PAUL MEURICE. Translated by J. W. HARDING. 1 vol., 8vo.

These Memoirs date back to 1825, when Hugo witnessed the coronation of Charles X., at Rheims. They contain characteristic sketches of Thiers, Blanqui, Louis Philippe, &c., and descriptions of the stirring scenes in Paris during the Revolution of 1848, and the Siege of Paris, and the Commune.

his Son, W. E. OSWELL. Illustrated from Photographs and Drawings by H. Macbeth Raeburn. 2 vols., 24s. net.

The subject of this Memoir was a school-fellow, at Rugby, of the late Dean Stanley, the late Dean Vaughan, and the late Tom Hughes. Endowed with the true nomadic spirit, he made five expeditions into the interior of Africa between the years 1844 and 1851. Two of these were made with Dr. Livingstone, who plays an important part in the book. Not only has the correspondence between the two men been drawn upon, but Mrs. Livingstone-Bruce has placed her father's private Journal at the disposal of the Author.

but he has succeeded in presenting a vivid picture of London life a century ago. . . . Though there is no avoidance of the picturesque sides of the career of famous rogues, the precariousness of their joys only serves to emphasise the lessons in virtue which more prosaic records of crime usually bring out."

materials, which he sets before his readers in an engrossing fashion."

Dr. RICHARD GARNETT, C.B.

Twenty Handsome Volumes, comprising the Great Literature of All Times.

SPECIMEN PAGES OF THE LIBRARY.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to give an adequate idea of a work that is in itself a great library by means of a few specimen pages or mere description. The Standard will, however, send, post paid, to any address a full Prospectus of "The Library of Famous Literature," together with specimen pages, specimen illustrations, pages from the index, and the like. But those who prefer to file their subscriptions at once, and thus take advantage of the special prices which are offered in advance of the day of publication, should read carefully the next column.

THE STANDARD'S INTRODUCTORY OFFER.

To make the Library thoroughly known, The Standard now offers a limited edition at half the regular price. When this edition is exhausted the Library will be sold at a very much higher price than is asked now. ## JOHN C. NIMMO'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW WORK BY THE REV. F. A. GASQUET, D.D., O.S.B. IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF THE REFORMATION PERIOD.

In 1 vol., demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, price 12s. 6d. net.

THE EVE of the REFORMATION: Studies in the Religious Life and Thought of the English People in the Period preceding the Rejection of the Roman Jurisdiction by Henry VIII. By FRANCIS AIDAN GASQUET, D.D., O.S.B.

Note.—This is not a controversial work, but a study chiefly of the literature, &c., of the period, in order to see what people were doing, saying, and thinking about before the change of religion. As touching upon rather new ground, and at the same time widening the field of view in the Reformation question, it should be of great interest at the present moment.

NEW ILLUSTRATED WORK ON PALESTINE.

In 1 vol., demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, with 16 Illustrations reproduced in colours in Facsimile of the Original Paintings by the Author, price 12s. 6d. net.

TWO YEARS in PALESTINE and SYRIA. By MARGARET THOMAS, Author of "A Scamper through Spain and Tangier," &c.

Note.—This book is being looked forward to with great interest by travellers; so many people have, in one out-of-the-way corner or another of Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australia, met this versatile lady. A Royal Academy silver medalist, she has had many pictures and pieces of sculpture exhibited in the Royal Academy. This (her new book) will be illustrated with sixteen reproductions in colours of her oil paintings. The subjects of these were painted on the spot, and the reproductions are by a new process not as yet employed for book illustration.

AN ARTIST IN SPAIN.

The DAILY TELEGRAPH says: "A powerful and impressive romance. One of those tales of exciting adventure in the 'confection' of which Mr. Boothby is not excelled by any novelist of the day."

The WORLD says: "By far the best of Mr. Boothby's work we have seen as yet; there is the true ring of romance and feeling in it.... Would do admirably for the stage."

PHAROS, THE EGYPTIAN.

"This powerful novel is weird, wonderful, and soul-stirring. Mr. Boothby succeeds in making it almost real, and its marvels and mysteries almost credible. There never was in this world so strange and wonderful a love story, and Mr. Guy Boothby's admirers will probably agree that the most marvellous fiction he has ever produced is 'Pharos, the Egyptian.'"—Scotsman.

G. J. WHYTE-MELVILLE'S NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. each volume.

With Illustrations by John Charlton, G. P. Jacomb-Hood, Lucy Kemp-Welch, S. E. Waller, and others.

The Series is well printed from type specially cast, on Dickinson's best antique paper, and neatly and handsomely bound in cloth gilt, with design by A. A. Turbayne.

"Whyte-Melville was a born story-teller, whose tales, full of satisfying incident, never flagged. He could not tell a story ill; and generally he told it so well that it was hard to lay the unfinished volume by. Nor should we forget the many-aided versatility of the author. To have written equally brilliantly of the camp as well as the field, of life in ancient Rome and in the English country house, is no small proof of the wide knowledge and fertile imagination of the writer."—Speciator.

"Among the books of which English men and women will never tire are those by the late lamented Whyte-Melville, who was at once a society man, a keen sportsman, and a novelist with a facile pen. Good judges will, of course, provide themselves with a whole set of the new edition, and a record sale may be predicted."—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

"No better set of these favourite novels could be desired, binding, type, paper, and pictures all being of the best."—Nottingham Guardian.

THE ORANGE GIRL.

By Sir WALTER BESANT, Author of "All Sorts and Conditions of Men."

"Sir Walter Besant is always interesting, but Sir Walter Besant on old London is more than interesting. And though the London of 'The Orange Girl' is not so very old—only the eighteenth century—yet it is so vastly different from the London we know now that it might be of a date many centuries back. The Orange Girl is one Jenny Wilmot.... She is a delightful character, drawn with the charm of Sir Walter Besant at his best. The story of her life is as full of interest and excitement as one could wish for, and the villains she baffles are excellent specimens of their class. It would be difficult to find more finished rascals than Probins and Merriew. Apart from the plot, which is a good one, 'The Orange Girl' owes a great deal of its charm to the excellent word-pictures of last-century London with which Sir Walter hanges his pages."—Black and White.

The Literary Week.

MR. JOHN MORLEY's monograph on Oliver Cromwell will begin to run serially in the Century in the November number.

A SHORT while ago, as many of our readers know, Mr. Stopford Brooke delivered a course of lectures on Robert Browning at University College, London. The lectures were regularly attended by upwards of three hundred and fifty persons, and were received with such pleasure that a movement was at once set on foot for the purpose of making provision for the regular delivery of similar courses, and at the same time of paying some public tribute to Mr. Stopford Brooke. A meeting was held, at which the scheme grew into a definite proposal to establish in perpetuity at University College a new Lectureship or Professorship of Literature or Poetry, to be called by Mr. Brooke's name, to be held by him as long as he is willing, and afterwards, subject to the appointment by the trustees of the fund, by men who will carry on similar work. This scheme has the approval of the Council of University College and of the Professor of English Literature there, Mr. W. P. Ker. £10,000 is the sum fixed upon to endow the chair, and a strong committee has been formed. Intending subscribers should communicate with the hon. treasurer, Mr. J. Foster Howe, Holwood, Grove-park, Lee, S.E. The hon. secretaries are: Mr. C. Herbert Smith, 2, Garden-court, Temple; and Miss Kate M. Warren, 45, Clarendon-road, W.

We give below the names of the six books which during the past month have been most popular in America, as estimated by the New York Bookman; and the six which have been most popular in England, as deduced from replies from booksellers all over the country. This is the English list:

The King's Mirror. Anthony Hope.
Kit Kennedy. S. R. Crockett.
A Double Thread. E. T. Fowler.
No. 5, John Street. R. Whiteing.
The Orange Girl. Sir W. Besant.
The Solitary Summer. Anon.

This is the American list:

{ David Harum. E. N. Westcott.
{ Richard Carvel. W. Churchill.
When Knighthood was in Flower. E. Caskoden.
No. 5, John Street. R. Whiteing.
The Market Place. H. Frederic.
A Gentleman Player. R. N. Stephens.
Children of the Mist. E. Phillpotts.

CONCERNING the above American list we have received the following letter from the Macmillan Co., of New York: "There is a curious inaccuracy in the summary of the best selling books in America which is published in the October number of the New York Bookman. Out of the twenty-nine towns from which the figures are obtained, twenty return as the most popular book Richard Carvel, by Winston Churchill; whereas, in the summary of the returns, the first place is given to David Harum, which stands first in only eight towns. An inaccuracy of this kind gives rather a rude shock to the faith which we have hitherto placed upon these interesting returns in the New York Bookman, which are always watched with no little interest."

THE Life of Christ, on which "Ian Maclaren" (the Rev. John Watson) has been engaged for some time, is to run serially in England in a magazine specially projected for it by Sir George Newnes. This is the Horn Magazine, a periodical for the English Sunday, which will begin in December. In America "Ian Maclaren's" work will be printed in McClure's Magazine.

THE statement that Mr. Rider Haggard has gone to British Columbia on a mining expedition is wrong. The papers have confused two names. Mr. Rider Haggard remains to till his farm, the gentleman who is intent upon Alaskan gold being Mr. F. C. D. Haggard, a well-known figure on the Stock Exchange.

MR. HALL CAINE's reply, which serves as preface for the new half-crown edition of The Christian, to the critics of that book is spirited and exhaustive. But it is not so conclusive as to prevent criticism of itself. Into one point, at any rate, we are interested to inquire. Concerning the ambiguous wording of what is perhaps the principal scene in the story, where John Storm remains under Glory Quayle's roof (or does not remain), Mr. Hall Caine confesses to a mischievous impulse: "When I wrote the chapter in question," he now says, "I knew it would be interpreted according to the moral standard of the readers reading it, and that I might properly stand aside in silence and watch the self-revelations which certain persons were making." This is a new position for the author to occupy. Should fiction be employed for such purposes, or should it be straightforward and explicit? It may surely be argued that novelists have no right to leave any situation as important as this to a reader's whim; that their duty is to narrate without ambiguity. If they use their books to make discoveries concerning their readers' moral calibre, they are not playing the game.

HENCEFORWARD the Speaker is to be the organ of young Oxford Liberalism. The final number of the paper on its old lines was published on Saturday last. Therein the editor, Sir Wemyss Reid, says a farewell word, and lays down the control which he has exercised for ten years. The new Speaker will be edited by Mr. Philip Carr and Mr. J. L. Hammond. Every number will contain signed articles on topics of the week, always from the Liberal point of view, and frequently will be found articles by representative Scottish, Irish, and provincial Liberals, and foreign correspondence from well-informed Liberals in the capitals of Europe and America.

IN an interview in the Daily News Sir Wemyss Reid speaks freely and interestingly concerning his long journalistic career. We extract a passage:

"Tell me, Sir Wemyss—you have known great numbers of journalists—have you known any who took up their work without serious convictions, and yet were successful?"

"Never!" came the emphatic reply. "As a matter of fact, I can hardly recall a single instance of a journalist who wrote merely to order. I knew one man who was editor of a Tory paper while privately professing to be a Radical; but that was all. He was a failure. The man who writes without convictions, or contrary to his own views, cannot permanently impose on the public. He is sure to be, sooner or later, found out. I believe such men are very rare. The old foolish notion of the journalist as a hired bravo, who sells his pen to either side, as the soldier of fortune sold his sword, is being exploded. No journalist with any self-respect, or any sense of honour, would do it. For a writer to convince the public he must first himself be convinced."

"When," Sir Wemyss Reid added, "as a junior reporter, I first went forth with pencil and pocket-book, I felt a strange glow in the thought that now I had laid hands on a lever that moves the conscience of mankind. I think so still. Next to the Church, there is nothing by which you can so directly, so widely, and so quickly influence your fellow-men as by the Press."

ACCORDING to Mr. Archer's article on the Drama in this week's World, Mr. Forbes Robertson had the opportunity of purchasing from Mr. Alexander the rights in Mr. Stephen Phillips's play, "Paolo and Francesca." Says Mr. Archer: "Here was an experiment worth the making!—an experiment in which success meant splendid triumph, and even failure would have meant glory. Success, as I have admitted, can never be predicted with absolute certainty; accidents will happen even to the most admirable plays; and bad acting, a perverse audience, or stupid criticism, might play havoc with Mr. Phillips's play, as with any other. But if a great play has been written in our time, this is assuredly it. Not an altogether easy play to cast or act, and one which demands for its mounting the finest artistic tact and intelligence; but these are not conditions to deter a manager like Mr. Robertson." Whatever may be the fate of Mr. Phillips's tragedy with managers, it will very shortly be in the hands of the reading public, or that small section thereof which cares for new dramatic poetry.

MORE particular criticism of Mr. Phillips is to be found in Blackwood from the steady pen of the "Looker-on," who has been reading Mr. Phillips's two poems on the Dreyfus case. The critic writes: "So far as these short pieces can inform us, Mr. Phillips's poetic faculty is the full and lasting fund that could not be counted upon with certainty when he first drew upon it. Both have fine lines—finely conceived, finely expressed, and moving with a majesty which no other of our younger poets has ever attempted." Certain of these lines are then quoted. But then comes the other side of the matter. Mr. Phillips is severely reprimanded for encouraging the Almighty with the compliment, "Thou more than Mars"; and also for his comparison of Christ with "a deeply injured but otherwise and in himself ordinary artillery captain." "These are marvels," says the "Looker-on," "which have no explanation for me. But it deeply concerns Mr. Phillips to find one, and to use it for purgation and avoidance."

MR. WILLIAM ARCHER has an interesting and informing article on "The American Language" in the current Pall Mall Magazine, wherein he displays a kindness for the racy idiom of Transatlantic speech that may stagger less catholic minds. But Mr. Archer has always cultivated a rare receptivity for new ideas. Says he:

It is a sheer pedantry—nay, a misconception of the laws which govern language as a living organism—to despise pithy and apt colloquialisms, and even slang. In order to remain healthy and vigorous, a literary language must be rooted in the soil of a copious vernacular, from which it can extract and assimilate, by a chemistry peculiar to itself, whatever nourishment it requires. It must keep in touch with life in the broadest acceptance of the word; and life at certain levels, obeying a psychological law which must simply be accepted as one of the conditions of the problem, will always express itself in dialect, provincialism, slang.

Taking, later, two Americanisms as examples of bad and good, Mr. Archer writes thus soundly:

My point, then, is that "scientist" ought to live on its merits, "transpire" to die on its demerits. With regard to every neologism we ought first to inquire: "Does it fill a gap? Does it serve a purpose?" And if that question be answered in the affirmative, we may next consider whether it is formed on a reasonably good analogy and in consonance with the general spirit of the language. "Truthful," for example, is said to be an Americanism, and at one time gave offence on that account. It is not only a vast improvement on the stilted "veracious," but one of the prettiest and most thoroughly English words in the dictionary.

For American peculiarities of pronunciation Mr. Archer has less admiration, but he refrains from condemnation.

BUT concerning American slang Mr. Archer is not always quite accurate. "Scrap," he says, "in the sense of quarrel [and fight], is one of the few exceedingly common American expressions which have as yet taken no hold in England." This is not so. The East End of London, at any rate, has known what scrapping is for many a day, and has now indeed hardly any other word for the ordinary set-to with the "raws." Mr. Gus Elen, an impersonator of coster life whose delineations are valuable for their accuracy, has used "scrap" in his songs for several years. Again, Mr. Archer, for examples of the Bowery habit of substituting "d" for "t," refers his readers to two recent books, neither of which has yet found an English publisher. He might more suitably have sent them to Mr. Stephen Crane's tragic little story, Maggie, which Mr. Heinemann issued several years ago, or to later works of the same writer. In Maggie Bowery talk is reproduced to perfection.

THE sagacious Mr. Dooley, as Mr. Archer calls him, continues, in Monday's Westminster Gazette, his burlesque account of the Dreyfus trial. The fun grows faster and more furious week by week, and our only regret is that to prepare a Gallic equivalent of the Chicago saloon-keeper's Irish is beyond the power of any human translator's intellect. "'While Gin'ral Mercier's proceedin' with his remarks,' says the prisidint of the Coort, 'call Col. Pat th' Clam, who's sick an' can't come. Swear Gin'ral Billot, Gin'ral Boisdoffer, Gin'ral Chammy, an' th' former mimbers iv th' Gover'mint.' 'I object to their bein' sworn,' says Matther Blamange. 'They must be sw'ra,' says th' prisidint. 'How th' divlle can they perjure thimselves if they ain't sworn?'" Again: "'Who ar-re ye, annyhow?' says the prisidint to Matther Blamange. 'I'm the counsel f'r the pris'ner,' says Matther Blamange. 'Git out,' says th' prisidint.'"

THE organ of Ruskin Hall, Oxford, promises to be a firebrand in the home of spires and lost causes. Young Oxford it is called, and on its first page is a rude woodcut representing the University as a gigantic sphinx, and Ruskin Hall as a small man with pickaxe and a spade. Subsequently we come to a series of pictures of a University Don for whom Ruskin Hall feels pity, and whom, the more, it takes in hand in order to straighten out his deformities "and make a man of him." The audacity of it! The other drawings, and they are very numerous, are all in the same vein: Ruskin Hall is the reformer, the galvaniser; Oxford the moribund hulk.

WE give this week a portrait of the lady who is publicly known as "Lucas Malet." Mrs. Harrison began her career as a novelist in 1882 with Mrs. Lorimer. This was followed in 1885 by Colonel Enderby's Wife, in 1888 by A Counsel of Perfection, and then came, in 1891, her most powerful work The Wages of Sin. "Lucas Malet" works slowly, at her own pace, and after The Wages of Sin it was five years before The Carissima appeared. Her new story is awaited with much interest.

"LUCAS MALET" (MRS. WILLIAM HARRISON).

MR. KIPLING's new book, Stalky & Co., has a prefatory poem from which we quote a few stanzas.

Western wind and open surge
Took us from our mothers;
Flung us on a naked shore (Twelve bleak houses by the shore!
Seven summers by the shore!)
'Mid two hundred brothers.

There we met with famous men
Set in office o'er us;
And they beat on us with rods—
Faithfully with many rods—
Daily beat us on with rods,
For the love they bore us.

Out of Egypt unto Troy—
Over Himalaya—
Far and sure our bands have gone—
Hy-Brasil or Babylon,
Islands of the Southern Run,
And cities of Cathaia!

And we all praise famous men—
Ancients of the College;
For they taught us common sense—
Tried to teach us common sense—
Truth and God's Own Common Sense,
Which is more than knowledge!

SCENE: A CIRCULATING LIBRARY.

LADY: "Then you have nothing at all of Thomas Love Peacock's?"

ASSISTANT: "Nothing, madam. You see, this is only a circulating library, and Mr. Peacock's works are purely literary."

THE author of certain charming Irish songs and ballads which from time to time have been printed in Blackwood, Miss "Moira O'Neill," has collected her poems, which, under the title of Songs of the Glen, Messrs. Blackwood are about to publish.

IN a leading article in its issue of last Monday, the Morning Post takes our contributor "Z." to task for his attack on Gray's "Elegy" as a schoolroom classic. It is, however, clear that the writer of the article has not studied "Z.'s" argument. Our contributor did not "deride the sentiment" of the "Elegy"; he was only anxious that it should not be rubbed off in the endless iteration of the reading-class. Nor does the writer answer "Z.'s" objections when he says: "We know no pleasure, in all the pleasures of poetry, equal to that of the expanding appreciation which comes with increasing years." It was for this very expansion that "Z." pleaded, when he pointed out that a play of Shakespeare's, read in the schoolroom, would go with a boy through life, and be more and more understood, whereas the "Elegy," having no root in boyhood, was apt to perish in the tiresome usage of the reading-class.

INCIDENTALLY the same writer attributes to Mr. Eden Phillpotts the origin of the phrase "the human boy." Surely Mr. Chadband came first.

OMARISM has led an American gentleman, Mr. Isaac Bassett Choate, to an excursion into the FitzGeraldian metre entitled Obeyd, the Camel Driver, which is published at the Home Journal office. The pleasing motto of the little book is an Arabic proverb running: "The camel driver has his thoughts, and the camel—he has his thoughts." Mr. Choate begins with the driver's thoughts, and then adds those of the camel, a most laudable attempt to present both sides of the case.

MEANWHILE another American Omarian has arisen insisting upon a change in the spelling of the great hedonist's name. "Not Omar," says he, "but 'Umar.'" "Umar," he adds, "is the way in which the immortal tentmaker wrote his own name. Moreover, there is no letter or sound of 'o' in the Persian. The accent, or stress, is on the last syllable, both of 'Umar' and of 'Khayyám,' as is the case with all Persian words, with perhaps a dozen exceptions. When written 'Omar,' there is a noticeable tendency to pronounce the name with the first syllable stressed, which is anathema to the real student of 'Umar.'" We are now in train to learn who are the real students of Omar—that is, "Umar"—and who not. It is getting high time for a division of sheep and goats.

BREVITY has been more in favour during late years than for two centuries. Early Victorian writers were long indeed; eighteenth century writers were long; the artists in little ended with Herrick and Prior, beginning again with our own times. It is Herrick of whom we are distantly reminded—the Herrick of the "Noble Numbers"—by the small manual of daily maxims which the Rev. Frederick Langbridge has composed under the title Little Tapers (R.T.S.). Mr. Langbridge's manner may be illustrated by two or three quotations:

Sin has a Sin on either Arm.

Who knocks so loud?—"A little lonely sin."

"Slip through," we answer, and all Hell is in.

"Happy Worm," says the Eagle; "Thou must Creep!"

God set thy na'ure in a certain key:
Therein do thou work out the melody.

It is the Trifles Matter Most.

God sends great angels in our sore dismay,
But little ones go in and out all day.

A Stout Heart is Halfway There.

Arouse thy courage ere it fails and faints:
God props no Gospel up with sinking saints.

It would be hard, indeed, to compress counsel more closely than this.

MISS GERTRUDE WARD, Mr. Humphry Ward's sister, the author of the Life of Bishop Smythies, has in the press Letters from East Africa, 1895-97.

A NEW novel of social life in England, written by Mrs. de la Pasture, the author of Deborah of Tod's, will be published by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. next week. The title of the new book is Adam Grigson.

Bibliographical.

In the preface to his Family Letters and Memoir of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Mr. W. M. Rossetti said that if the work found favour with the public he should be disposed "to rummage" among his "ample stock of materials," and "produce a number of details" relating not only to his brother Gabriel, but also to "other members or connections of the family." The firstfruit of that "rummaging" was the volume, issued last year, entitled Ruskin: Rossetti: Pre-Raphaelitism. Included in this were many letters by D. G. Rossetti and some extracts from the diary of Ford Madox Brown. Now Mr. W. M. Rossetti announces another volume, to be called Pre-Raphaelite Diaries and Letters, comprising more letters by D. G. Rossetti and (apparently) more extracts from Madox Brown's diary. This method of book-making may be very agreeable to Mr. W. M. Rossetti, but it is very irritating to the students and admirers of the Pre-Raphaelite group, who, with all these fresh "materials" cropping up from time to time, must feel mystified. However, Mr. W. M. Rossetti promises to print in the forthcoming book his Journal of the P.R.B. (to which, it seems, he was a sort of secretary), and that will certainly be welcome.

Messrs. Macmillan are to give circulation in England to a collection of Representative English Comedies, put together by an American professor (C. M. Cayley). The work will be in five volumes, and therefore, one may hope, tolerably comprehensive. It is a little surprising that it should have been left to a Transatlantic scholar to perform this labour of love; but so it is. We possess literally no representative collection of English comedies. It is true that, of the five volumes of the British Drama published in 1804, two are given up to Comedies, but these begin with Jonson and end with Cumberland, making but a meagre show. It is greatly to be hoped that Mr. Cayley will start with "Ralph Roister Doister," and come down to Mr. Pinero. It would suffice if, of English comedy-writers since Sheridan, he gave specimen scenes only. We are to receive also from America a book by another professor on The Development of the English Novel; but this has already been done for us by Mr. Walter Raleigh, in a fashion on which it will be difficult to improve.

With reference to the promised anthology entitled The Kings' Lyrics—poems of the reigns of James I. and Charles I.—I am reminded of the existence in the "Canterbury Poets" series of a little collection of Cavalier and Courtier Lyrics, edited by Mr. W. H. Direks. But that book has a different scope from that of The Kings' Lyrics, covering as it does the ground between the accession of Charles I. and the death of Charles II. A still earlier selection was The Courtly Poets (1870), for which Dr. Hannah was responsible, and which also had a larger scheme than that of The Kings' Lyrics.

Mr. J. R. Tutin, who promises us a Concordance to Omar Khayyâm, has already done some excellent work in the belles lettres in a modest way. We are indebted to him, for instance, for a reprint of the Sacred Poems of Crashaw (published originally in 1662). Previously to that (1887) he had printed a selection from Crashaw's verse for private circulation. Two years ago he reprinted Christopher Smart's Song to David. He has also edited the poems of Burns, the early poems of Wordsworth, and selections from Henry Vaughan, Moore, and Keats, and has compiled a bibliography of Wordsworth, a Wordsworth Birthday Book, and a Shelley Birthday Book.

Miss Lilian Whiting is to give us a Study of Mrs. Browning and a memoir of Miss Kate Field. The latter will have the greater freshness. Whether the English public is much interested in Miss Field remains to be seen. She wrote monographs on Ristori and Fechter, which have been circulated over here; and I think her descriptions of Dickens's Readings have found their way to us. But that is about all. A comedietta from her pen is in French's list.

It is pleasant to note among the books of the near future a selection from the verse of Crabbe. It will not be the first of its kind, but will be welcome, because Crabbe at present is too little known, even to those who study literature. Welcome, again, will be the "Bibelot" which is to be devoted to Gay's Trivia, and Other Pieces. Gay is another writer with whom the general reader is too little acquainted. The late Mr. Underhill gave us an excellent edition of Gay, but something a little more "popular" was wanted and will now be supplied.

In the department of classic fiction we are to have a reprint of Galt's Ringan Gilhaize; or, the Covenanters—a story which cannot be described as hackneyed, seeing that it has not been reprinted, apparently—in separate form—since 1823. The announced reprint of Vathek will also be acceptable, though we had one so recently as five years ago (edited by Dr. Garnett, and illustrated withal). Beckford's story was in the "Minerva Library" (1891), and "Cassell's National Library" (1886); so it cannot be regarded as inaccessible even to the humblest reader.

In undertaking a translation of Ibsen's "Love's Comedy" into English, Mr. C. H. Herford really does supply a "felt want." It comes, however, late in the day. The French had a version done for their benefit three years ago.

There is a lack of originality among literary people in the matter of book-titles. Thus, in 1889, there appeared a little volume of essays called Rambles in Bookland. Some little while after that title was bodily annexed for the purposes of a column in a daily paper. Then, in 1893, came Mr. C. F. Blackburn's Rambles in Books; and now, I see, we are to receive from Mr. Joseph Shaylor a publication entitled Saunterings in Bookland. Yet another instance: two years ago Mr. J. A. Hammerton produced a book called The Actor's Art, and now a Mr. Stanley Jones presents us with one entitled The Actor and His Art.

The Collected Poems of Thomas Edward Brown—that is to be another of the season's benefactions. Brown first appeared in print as a poet in 1873, but it was not till 1881 that he published his first volume—Fo'e'sle Yarns. Then came The Doctor, &c., in 1887, The Manx Witch, &c., in 1889, and Old John, &c., in 1893.

Hitherto, Mr. A. B. Walkley has been known in the book-world only as the author of some reprinted Playhouse Impressions, published in 1892. His forthcoming book, Frames of Mind (also contributed originally to the Press), will help to exhibit his versatility, which is considerable. He is a busier journalist than is generally supposed.

We are to have a new edition, revised, curtailed here, augmented there, of Mr. H. D. Traill's dialogues, The New Lucian. It is surprising to be reminded that these date back no further (so far as their book form is concerned) than 1884. One thinks of them as older.

THE BOOKWORM.

War is Suicide.

Is War now Impossible? By I. S. Bloch. (Grant Richards 6s.)

THIS is a translation from the sixth and last volume of M. Bloch's great work on The Future of War, which is known to have influenced powerfully the ideas of the Czar with regard to the late Peace Conference. From this fact, and the further fact that it is prefaced by Mr. W. T. Stead, the reader knows what will be the author's prepossessions. Nevertheless, and in spite of the fact that M. Bloch is simply a Russian banker, not in any way a military man, this book is very different from the mass of literature issued by peace societies. The original is a monumental examination of modern war in all its aspects and details; while the volume here selected by Mr. Stead for translation sums up the conclusions of the previous volumes. The work has received the approval of a council of military experts to whom the Czar submitted it for investigation, so that we may rely on its general accuracy and value, civilian though the writer be. It is no declamation against war; it eschews rhetoric and eloquence. The very effectiveness of it lies in its cool scientific spirit of inquiry, its logical marshalling of facts and figures. Those facts and calmly demonstrated conclusions from fact have a remorseless eloquence, a terrible rhetoric. M. Bloch, we think, proves up to the hilt that the great European war which we all fear means national suicide for all the European peoples. But with his further and final conclusion, that war is therefore impossible, we are less ready to agree: it is based upon the assumption that nations do not commit suicide. Is he so sure of that?

The future great war will have no parallel in the past. The long wars which followed the French Revolution, and ended at Waterloo, had a unity; it was France against Europe, and each side fought (so to speak) with its back to its own wall. The nearest parallel is the Thirty Years' War, where nation fell on the back of nation, with inconclusive victories, marching and countermarching, endless prolongation, fire, famine, and devastation, leaving the ends of war finally unaccomplished by either of the main contestants. But there auxiliary nations drew out of and re-entered the struggle at pleasure; here there will be no retreat, no cessation for any country, once the enormous conflict is begun, except by complete overthrow or exhaustion. It will be a universal and incessant Thirty Years' War, with the added horror of murderous weapons and whole peoples set in the battle-field.

At the first declaration of war, the first sound of the tocsin (so to speak), the sanguinary business will begin. Before that declaration has died on the ears of Europe, over the frontiers will come streams of cavalry: fierce riders, Uhlans or Cossacks, eddying through the borderlands, and throwing off their spray of lances to threaten the interior. Telegraphs will be cut, depôts and government resources generally destroyed or seized; communications will be interrupted, and mobilisation thwarted in every possible way. In the rear of these swarms presently the main armies will roll into the country by hundreds of thousands, while behind slowly form and surge forward reserves in millions. No carefully trained bodies like the little English armies of the Soudan or the Afghan border, vast numbers of the invaders (as of the defenders) will come straight from the fields, the workshop, the desk, the counting-house. With a load of eighty pounds on their backs they will have to make long marches in all weathers, and sleep on the ground, often under the rain. In a fortnight, without seeing an enemy or hearing a bullet, a hundred thousand soldiers will crowd the hospitals. Such is the calculation of the army doctors. Hardship and sickness will do the work among these unseasoned men. Leaving this appalling delta behind it, the army will emerge upon the enemy. But, further, it will leave on its track a straggle of corpses and wounded from bullets that fly invisible as pestilence, fired by hidden sharpshooters whose rifles show not a puff of smoke to betray their lurking-place. The cavalry of the main army now spread out in patrols to reconnoitre the enemy; but they bring back vague reports as to his position and numbers. The enemy's skirmishers prevented their getting into touch with his main forces. At a distance of half a mile the skirmishers' fire began to empty their saddles. The smokeless powder did not suffer them to see where the skirmishers were posted; and it was impossible for them, exposed on horseback, to stand the deadly rain of bullets. Infantry will have to push forward as skirmishers, and complete (much less satisfactorily than could be desired) the task of reconnoitring. During the battle that follows the cavalry cannot (it is probable) be used. They will have to stand back some distance from the firing-line or every saddle would be emptied. Only in pursuit can they again be brought into use.

The whole battle-field will be visible. No smoke, for the powder is smokeless; little sound from rifle fire compared with old battles, for even volley firing cannot be heard beyond a mile. There will be the rattle of one's own rifles, the noise of the great guns, and the clear, unimpeded sight of every man who falls—and they will fall in ranks. There can be no better description than that which M. Bloch quotes from a French military writer:

The distance is 16,000 metres from the enemy. The artillery is in position, and the command has been passed along the batteries to "give fire." The enemy's artillery replies. Shells tear up the soil and burst; in a short time the crew of every gun has ascertained the distance of the enemy. Then every projectile discharged bursts in the air over the heads of the enemy, raining down hundreds of fragments and bullets on his position. Men and horses are overwhelmed by this rain of lead and iron. Guns destroy one another, batteries are mutually annihilated, ammunition cases are emptied. Success will be with those whose fire does not slacken. In the midst of this fire the battalions will advance.

Now they are but 2,000 metres away. Already the rifle bullets whistle round and kill, each not only finding a victim, but penetrating files, ricocheting, and striking again. Volley succeeds volley, bullets in great handfuls, constant as hail, and swift as lightning, deluge the field of battle. The artillery having silenced the enemy is now free to deal with the enemy's battalions. On his infantry, however loosely it may be formed, the guns direct thick iron rain, and soon in the position of the enemy the earth is deluged with blood.

The firing lines will advance one after the other, battalions will march after battalions; finally, the reserves will follow. Yet with all this movement in the two armies there will be a belt a thousand paces wide, separating them as by a neutral territory, swept by the fire of both sides—a belt which no living being can stand for a moment. The ammunition will be almost exhausted; millions of cartridges, thousands of shells, will cover the soil; but the fire will continue until the empty ammunition cases are replaced with full; melinite bombs will turn to dust farm-houses, villages, and hamlets, destroying everything that might be used as cover, obstacle, or refuge.

The moment will approach when half the combatants will be mowed down; dead and wounded will lie in parallel rows, separated one from the other by that belt of a thousand paces which will be swept by a cross-fire of shells which no living being can pass. The battle will continue with ferocity; but still that thousand paces unchangingly separate the foes.

Who shall have gained the victory? Neither.

Thus, as the result of so much bloodshed, it is probable that the battle would be indecisive. It would be impossible to push home a decisive attack across that zone of fire so eloquently described. For armies in future will be entrenched. The defenders will rest upon chains of fortresses, to which are attached entrenched camps. Even the invaders will entrench themselves, as a defence against the terrible hostile fire. Thus, whichever attacks, the war will be a series of Plevnas, with incalculably greater powers of defence. The assailants will only be able to advance on the enemy's position slowly, digging trenches for themselves as they proceed. It may take a whole day to arrive, in this manner, within possible striking distance of the adversary's lines. Battles will last for days—some venture to say a week. And when an army is beaten, it will retreat slowly, throwing up fresh earthworks and standing at bay behind them, until it reaches a fresh line of fortresses or receives reinforcements: so that it will scarcely be possible to turn defeat into rout. Nor will a new Sedan be possible. The forces of the nations are too nearly equal for one army to surround another; moreover, turning operations will be difficult, because with magazine-rifles and entrenchments a small force can hold a large one at bay till it is reinforced, and the attempt to turn the flank arrested. Everything points to campaigns long, stubborn, sanguinary, and indecisive; the attacker often becoming the defender, and the fortunes of war swaying ponderously to and fro.

The chief cause of this is the use of smokeless powder (which we have already noticed), and the immense improvement both in small arms and artillery. Not only can the magazine-gun volley a torrent of bullets with inconceivable rapidity, but its carrying power is enormously greater. It will carry two or three miles, and it can be used with effect at a mile. It will pierce a file of men with a single bullet, and will penetrate a tree, killing the man behind it. The old bullet soared in a curve, and it needed careful calculation to make it descend on its mark. From the modern rifle the bullet flies straight to its aim, at an even level above the ground. Therefore, without aiming at all, if the rifle be merely laid level, it will strike everything between the muzzle of the gun and the end of its flight. Yet, at the same time, it is much more accurate, and there are greater facilities for correct fire with it.

Artillery is still more destructive. Here is a frightful calculation:

It is estimated that if a body of men advancing to the attack had to traverse a distance of a mile and a half under the fire of a single battery, they would be exposed to 1,450 rounds before they crossed the zone of fire; and the bursting of the shells fired by that battery would scatter 275,000 bullets in fragments over the mile and a half across which they would have to march. In 1870 an ordinary shell when it burst broke into from nineteen to thirty pieces. To-day it bursts into 240. Shrapnel-fire in 1870 only scattered thirty-seven death-dealing missiles. Now it scatters 340. A bomb weighing about 70 lb. thirty years ago would have burst into forty-two fragments. To-day, when it is charged with peroxylene, it breaks up into 1,200 pieces, each of which is hurled with much greater velocity than the larger lumps which were scattered by a gunpowder explosion. It is estimated that such a bomb would effectively destroy all life within a range of 200 metres of the explosion.

We need not dwell on the superior accuracy given by range-finders, absence of smoke, and other causes. This is enough. To cope with the ranks and swathes of ghastly wounded men that will lie in the track of such fire what medical means are there? Really none. Firstly, the hospital department is completely inadequate; nor could any efforts make it adequate. Secondly, it will not be possible to find a safe spot near enough to the battlefield for the surgeons to do their work. The wounded must lie on the field for days—if, as happened at Gravelotte, their own comrades do not build the fallen, dead and living together, into a rampart for their own defence.

In such a war there is death to be gained, but not glory. The officers especially, who must expose themselves to encourage the men, will fall in appalling proportions. Nay, more: every country has bodies of expert shots, trained to do nothing but pick off officers. Several German and Austrian officers have told M. Bloch that if war break out they will, of course, do their duty; but they would head their men knowing they would never return. With the thoroughly trained officers mostly killed off, how are these masses of men (by that time consisting mostly of raw reserves) to be handled? They would become military mobs.

For the nations at home to maintain, feed, and provide transport for these immense hosts during a long war appears impossible, so vast would the expense be. Not only commerce, but the whole industrial and agricultural system must be disorganised through the prolonged absence in the battle-field of all the able-bodied workers. Ruin, financial and industrial, must result. The nations would be starving at home while the armies were starving in the field. Add (what M. Bloch omits) that, with the hosts of dead and wounded covering the battle-fields, or crowded into necessarily insanitary hospitals, there will be grave danger of widespread pestilence, and the breakdown of the whole machinery becomes complete. Finally would arise revolution, the infuriated peoples turning on the rulers who had betrayed them, with the suffering and discontented armies in no mood to lend themselves to repression. Nor would England escape. Dependent for our trade on the world's open markets, for our food supply on open imports, growing but corn enough at home for a three months' provision, our one safety is in the possibility of our fleet ensuring the trade routes. And few impartial authorities believe in that. Even were it so, the prices of convoyed food would rise to famine figures.

Such is the war of the future drawn by M. Bloch. For our part, we think it demonstrably true. War is suicide. We wish we could believe with the author that there will, therefore, be no war. But in France and England these facts are not recognised. England still imagines that even a disastrous war would be only a bigger Majuba, from which she could rally and recover. Now, two nations are enough to fire the train. Moreover, the clash of ambitions and national passions may drift the rulers into the catastrophe. Universal earth-hunger and bitter jealousies provide every opening for an irretrievable mistake. With so many climbers on the steep of ambition, there will some day be a fatal accident; and the first nation that slips will drag the others after it into the abyss of war. That is a form of virtual suicide possible to nations as to men.

A Nation of Philosophers.

The Six Systems of Indian Philosophy. By F. Max Müller. (Longmans.)

Auld Lang Syne. By F. Max Müller. Second Series. (Longmans.)

WE have placed these books together because they are the gathering up of the threads, as it were, of the work to which Mr. Max Müller has mainly devoted his life. His eyes have ever been fixed on the Orient. He has grown old in the quest of the meaning of the life and literature of ancient India; now he looks back affectionately on his labours, culls a fact here, picks a flower there, and gossips. The larger of the two volumes is modestly described as "some of the notes on the Six Systems of Indian Philosophy which have accumulated in my notebooks for many years." Learned, garrulous, kindly, discursive, combative, full of repetitions, and of a pleasant variety, the six hundred pages radiate enthusiasm, and proclaim the author's undying interest in "the most highly gifted races of mankind, and the solutions they have proposed for the eternal riddles of the world." It is an old man who speaks through these books. His work is done. He puts his spear by, and steps forth from the arena with this irreproachable homily on his lips: "Scholars who on questions of scholarship differ from us, as we differ from them should never be counted as personal enemies." In Auld Lang Syne (this is the second series, and less personal than the first) he gossips about his Indian friends, about the Veda, and about himself—an excellent subject, for he is an uncommon combination of scholar, gossip, gladiator, enthusiast, and sentimentalist.

India! How the vista opens at the name. A nation at for four thousand years has let the material world batten upon her, and has kept her secret thoughts through all because she knew that those thoughts were all that really mattered. "A society in which spiritual interests predominate and throw all material interests into the shade, a world of thinkers, a nation of philosophers." She has seen the peoples of antiquity rise, flourish, and fall, and still remains suave, mysterious, unaffected.

Indian philosophy is the most abstruse of subjects; Sanskrit names make the eyes ache, and they baffle the memory; the attempt to follow the reasoning of a Hindu sage is like trying to explain the stages of a kinematograph to a blind school; and yet the play of Mr. Max Müller's mind, and the humanity that runs through his exposition, is such, that as one turns these pages—stumbling, grappling—the picture grows, and remains—in broad brushwork, if you like—a living and suggestive thing, part of one's intellectual life.

The editor of The Sacred Books of the East has never visited India:

The dream of my life to see India face to face has never been realised. When I was young enough I had not the wherewithal to go there, and when, later in life, I was invited again and again by my Indian friends to go there, I was too old and too much tied down by duties from which there was no escape. Besides, unless I could have stayed in India at least two or three years, could have learned to speak the languages, and come to know the few native scholars still left, it was nothing to me. My India was not on the surface, but lay many centuries behind it.

But if Mr. Max Müller has never set foot in India he is there in the spirit to an extent that sometimes has embarrassing consequences. A recent mail brought him a series of questions, signed by a number of Indian gentlemen, with a request for an "early answer." The questions indicate the problems on which the modern Indian mind is brooding. Here are two of them:

What is your opinion regarding God and the soul? Is the latter a reflection of the former, or is the one quite separate from the other?

Is the universe eternal and self-abiding, or has it been created by some one?

The querists, if you please, were cloth merchants. "They probably," adds Mr. Max Müller, "expect my answer by return of post." And no doubt, by now, the anxious cloth merchants have received some kind of reply. For years of poring over Sanskrit texts have not dulled the Professor's kindliness nor deadened his enthusiasm; neither have they withered his German sentiment for romance.

Does not such a passage as this rouse in one the desire to read on, and learn more about the Rig-veda hymns?

Seeing that the Veda was certainly more ancient than anything we possessed of Aryan literature elsewhere, people jumped to the conclusion that it would bring us near to the very beginning of all things, and that we should find in the hymns of the Rig-veda the "very songs of the morning stars and the shouts of the sons of God."

Or this:

In India we still see, as it were, the last traces of the primordial surprise at the world. Their earliest thinkers seem still to feel strange in it, while Greeks and Romans are thoroughly at home in their little world. . . . The Indians, at least their leading thinkers, never cared so intensely for the span of life on earth as the Greeks did. . . . Even, while passing through the world their eyes were for ever fixed on the Beyond. . . . Their hearts would never forget the life that lay behind them, and their minds were for ever set on the life that was to come.

That wistfulness, sad and glad at once, dominates the lives of many Westerners also. Apropos, Mr. Max Müller prints this touching passage, as a hint to his correspondents who clamour for quick replies:

Life has its limits, every day has its limits, and one hour out of the twenty-four might well be left to an old man for dreaming, for looking back on the years and friends that are gone, and forward to that life to which our stay on earth forms, as he thinks, but a short prelude.

To Sanskrit scholars, to Orientalists, to students of comparative religion, the subject of these volumes is, of course, familiar. Their interest in them is the academic, or shall we say the sporting, interest of fellow-workers in the same field who, having already mastered the lie of the land, proceed to attack one another over the age of the gates, the construction of the roads, the writing on the milestones, and the period of the strata. But the world at large is not eager for specialist criticism. It is the atmosphere, the spirit of a book, that it demands, an answer to the questions: "Have I anything to learn from this book? Is there that in it to stimulate my imagination and to feed my mind?"

Here in the West we give of our best to material things. Our call has ever been to the factory, the market-place, the field of battle. In India the spectacle sweeps before us of, practically, a whole nation dominated by one interest—interest in the great problems of humanity here on earth.

Its kings surrounded themselves with a court of sages rather than of warriors, and the people at large developed and strengthened their old taste for religious and philosophical problems that has endured for centuries, and is not extinct even at the present time.

Climatic conditions and the simple morning civilisation of ancient India encouraged in that gentle people this habit of reflection and wonder at the miracle of the seasons. The struggle for life had not begun; conquest did not invite them; they knew nothing of the life of great cities; the means of communication between one settlement and another were so slight as to make journeys prohibitive; like the free animals, their tastes were few; devices for killing time had not occurred to them; the act of writing was unknown; such literature as they had was mnemonic—"what was there to do for those who, in order to escape from the heat of the tropical sun, had taken their abode in the shade of groves or in the caves of mountainous valleys, except to meditate on the world in which they found themselves placed, they did not know how or why?"

Truth is neither young nor old. It is eternal. It existed; it exists; it will exist. This the Hindu philosophers have never doubted; any more than they have ever doubted that the soul is immortal. To them the truth lies hidden in their Bible—the Veda. It is there, "self-luminous, like the sun." The Veda is; it needs no proof, but it needs explanation; and here, as elsewhere, each commentator must offer a new interpretation. Hence the mazes of Indian philosophy through which Mr. Max Müller and other redoubtable Sanskrit scholars have threaded their way. Needless to say, they do not always agree; indeed, during the last decade battle-dore and shuttlecock has been played with Sanskrit reputations. Learning and loving-kindness are not interchangeable terms.

The Vedas, as we possess them, are four systematically arranged collections of hymns and verses, probably 4,000 years old; and the Veda is often used in the sense of these four Vedas taken together. It is the oldest book in the world; yet till recent times it had never been published. The Veda, the Brahmins declared, was the primordial divine revelation; that it was not the composition of human authors, but the work of Brahman, the Supreme Spirit, who had revealed it to seers. A long period of time went to its production; and for hundreds of years, if not thousands, it was never reduced to writing. The ancient literature of India was entirely mnemonic. Boys had to spend years and years of their youth learning by heart line after line of certain books, and nothing else. Every word, every letter, every accent of the Veda had been settled by authority as far back as about the fifth century B.C.; and when, some hundreds of years later, it began to be written down, the MSS. were so few and so precious that none but a handful of native scholars had ever seen them.

Imagine, then, the sensation in India when Mr. Max Müller's edition of the Rig-veda (the first and most important of the four collections that form the Veda) was suddenly offered for sale in the bookshops of India. Their Bible—their venerable Bible—that had never been published during the four thousand years of its existence, to be translated and sold publicly by a Mlekkha—a barbarian! But the Brahmins soon acknowledged the great achievement, and later, when a second edition became necessary, it was the Maharajah of Vizianagram who offered to become responsible for the printing bill of £4,000.

It is, of course, impossible here and now to touch even the fringe of the profound and tortuous speculations that have resulted in the Six Systems. They share many things in common.

They all promise to teach the nature of the soul, and its relation to the Godhead or to a Supreme Being. They all undertake to supply the means of knowing the nature of that Supreme Being, and through that knowledge to pave the way to human happiness. They all share the conviction that there is suffering in the world which is something irregular, has no right to exist, and should therefore be removed.

Of the Six Systems, the first, called the Vedānta, is "clearly the native philosophy of India." Once a sage gave this pithy exposition of the fundamental doctrines of the Vedānta system:

In one half verse I shall tell you what has been taught in thousands of volumes: Brahman is true, the world is false, the soul is Brahman and nothing else.

It is something to have so clear a statement. So recondite and multifarious are the mental turns and twirls of those ancient philosophers, so voluminous are the emendations and annotations encrusted on the original truth by generations of second-class minds, that after turning the pages of this closely packed volume it is refreshing to hear even of that ancient reservoir of thought to which Mr. Max Müller refers more than once—"the secret springs of the wisdom of Kapila or Buddha Śākya Muni."

The longer I have studied the various systems the more have I become impressed with the truth of the view that there is behind the variety of the Six Systems a common fund of what may be called national or popular philosophy, a large Mānasa lake of philosophical thought and language, far away in the distant North, and in the distant Past, from which each thinker was allowed to draw for his own purposes.

If the present writer were asked to formulate a brief synopsis of the explanation of the riddle of life that these ancient Hindu seers evolved, he would adventure on something of this kind:

The world, as we know it, is Phenomenal.

Brahman, God, from whom we come, alone is Real.

The aim of our lives should be to blot out the Phenomenal, to recover the Real, to return to God, to regain God-consciousness. This can only be done by destroying that universal Nescience which causes suffering and makes us mistake the Phenomenal for the Real.

The soul never dies.

By the law of Karman every thought, every deed done, good or evil, continues through the ages, and bears fruit.

The reason of suffering is Nescience, non-discrimination, false knowledge—the effect, by the law of Karman, of thoughts thought, or deeds done, if not in this, then in former lives.

Must the effect of these thoughts and deeds go on for ever? Cannot the cycle of lives and deaths be stopped? Cannot freedom ever be attained? Yes! By Knowledge. By Knowledge of the Self within. By reconciling that self with the Divine.

Karman will cease to work only when Freedom has been gained. Then all will be well. Struggles will be over. The individual's humanity will be taken back into the God-head, not to put on a new nature, but to recover his old and true nature—in fact, to become what, in spite of the dreams and fancies of life, he has always been.

It is surely astounding [adds Mr. Max Müller] that such a system as the Vedānta should have been slowly elaborated by the indefatigable and intrepid thinkers of India thousands of years ago, a system that even now makes us giddy, as in mounting the last steps of the swaying spire of an ancient Gothic cathedral. None of our philosophers, not excepting Heraclitus, Plato, Kant, or Hegel, has ventured to erect such a spire, never frightened by storms or lightnings. Stone follows on stone in regular succession after once the first step has been made, after once it has been clearly seen that in the beginning there can have been but One, as there will be but One in the end.

"A system that makes us giddy." There, in six words, is expressed the effect on the mind of the man or woman who, from curiosity, or from the heart's cry for truth, attempts to understand the edifice of Indian philosophy. To lift the curtain, to push open the door—that has ever been the longing of the nations through all the centuries. One can but be thrilled with pity for the human agony that has gone to this great quest, that still continues unremittingly, and still finds us crying from the housetops to the stars. The Hindu philosophers taught that the Phenomenal world is a disability that must be overcome if we would find the Real. We in the West accept the world as a school for the practice of conduct and the development of character, and try to lull ourselves by the anodyne of work and good deeds.

Meanwhile, one reels back from the giddy heights of Hindu philosophy to the simplicity, say, of the prophet Micah: "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" Truth is eternal. It is the form only that changes. To all creeds the great truth applies: "Ask and ye shall receive." And to all, also, those words of the ancient Hindu seer:

When God has become really known all fetters fall.

In Chains at Omdurman.

A Prisoner of the Khaleefa: Twelve Years' Captivity at Omdurman. By Charles Neufeld. (Chapman & Hall.)

On April 1, 1887, Charles Neufeld, a German trader, left Wadi Halfa with a caravan, intending to trade in the Soudan, and from that day until September, 1898, he was lost to civilisation. Most of those years he spent in chains in the prison at Omdurman, refusing to acknowledge the Mahdi's mission, and suffering tortures which place the Khaleefa on the same unenvied pinnacle as that adorned by M. Lebon, of the Ile du Diable notoriety. But though

MR. CHARLES NEUFELD WRITING IN PRISON.

Charles Neufeld was cut off from the civilised world, many reports of him got through to Cairo which gave an impression of him which he is anxious to remove.

This handsome volume is a book with two purposes. One is to describe life at Omdurman under the tyranny of the Khaleefa—this is the more important in the eyes of the public; the other is to vindicate the author from the accusations hurled anonymously at him—this is the more important in Mr. Neufeld's eyes. It was said that he betrayed the caravan into the hands of the Dervishes; he shows, in a plain, straightforward account, how it was betrayed by guides Gabou and Hassan, with the result that Mr. Neufeld spent the best part of twelve years in an unspeakably filthy prison. It was said that he refused the chances given him to escape from the Soudan; he shows how his attempts were frustrated, and how close was the watch kept upon him in and out of prison. He was accused of marrying a native wife and of becoming a Mahdist; he shows that he was the only man who refused to give up his religion, and that he was married by the Khaleefa's order to a native woman much as the nuns were married by the same tyrant to Greek merchants. Mr. Neufeld's story bears the stamp of truth and his vindication appears to be complete, but to the general public the story of what went on at Omdurman will be of wider interest.

The account given by Mr. Neufeld of life in the Saier, or prison, at Omdurman, is, he assures us, toned down for European reading. This it is easy to believe, but even as it is the striking passages which are best worth quoting are better left to be read in the book itself. Dirt, black-mail, and the kourbash seem the principal features of prison life, and the chapter on "Prison Justice" is not one to be read by over-sensitive persons. When Neufeld was let out of prison it was to help manufacture saltpetre for the Khaleefa's powder magazine, and this, no doubt, gave rise to the story that he was making powder to shoot English soldiers with. As a matter of fact, the saltpetre he made was so bad that the powder-makers were unable to use it to any purpose. About two tons of the stuff is still lying unused in the stores at Omdurman. Of a more valuable derelict at Omdurman—the Khaleefa's treasure—Mr. Neufeld remarks that all good gold and silver jewellery, and coins, disappeared during the last fifteen years in the Soudan. The Khaleefa was entitled to one-fifth of all loot and all property, and he insisted on having his share in gold, but though it is impossible to say what estimate should be put on the Khaleefa's buried treasure, some idea may be gleaned from an examination of the books of the treasury, which were well kept. The few millions he buried will no doubt be discovered some day—but unofficially.

Perhaps the most interesting part of the book is that which describes the battle of Omdurman, from the point of view of the prisoner in the Saier at Omdurman. Vague hints came dropping in of the advance of the English, who crossed the desert with "iron devils," otherwise the railway. Then at last came the shells whistling overhead, and then all the prisoners in the yard were covered with dust and stones. A shell had struck the top of the prison wall, ricocheted to the opposite wall, and fallen without exploding in the prison of the women. Neufeld went nearly mad with joy, and shouted and danced, until the infuriated Baggara prisoners would have killed him had not the gaoler, Idris es Saier, locked them all up, and left Neufeld, to whom he looked to speak a good word for him to the English, out in the yard among the sympathisers with the Egyptian Government. The flight of the shells overhead had, we are told, a most extraordinary effect—they appeared to compress the atmosphere, and press it down to the earth; the prisoners could actually feel the pressure on their bodies, and with some it brought on nausea. During the night they could hear the pat, pat, pat of at first a few dozen bare feet, until eventually they could tell that thousands were running into the town. The refugees gave a striking account of the battle, and how the Dervish army had been mown down by the English and Egyptian troops; and then at last Idris came, frightened out of his life, to say that a big, tall man, who, he was told, was the dreaded Sirdar, had asked for Neufeld. The last order that he was to receive and obey in the Saier was, "Neufeld, out you go." "It was the Sirdar's order, and half carried by the friendly and strong arms supporting me, I obeyed."

Mr. Neufeld has his opinion to give on the Sirdar's tactics, and he expresses himself strongly that Lord Kitchener made one grave error—he gave quarter. He extended to a horde of murderers the advantages of civilised warfare, "and the clemency he felt called upon to extend to them will cost England the loss of many a gallant life yet." The Sirdar prevented his black troops from exercising the lex talionis on the men who had murdered, mutilated, and outraged their families in the past, and, in so doing, Mr. Neufeld holds that he committed an injustice to the men who had worked so long and so hard to see the Day of Retaliation. These words have an added strength from the fact that at the moment of their publication comes the news that the Khaleefa is collecting another large army in the southern Soudan, and that a new expedition will have to be sent against him.

The last chapter deals with the death of General Gordon, and Mr. Neufeld claims that the version he gives from the accounts of eye-witnesses is the only true one. Gordon was not stabbed in the back and dragged down the stairs of his palace at Khartoum. He died fighting, having killed sixteen or seventeen of his assailants with his sword, while his left hand was blackened with unburned powder of his at least thrice-emptied revolver. He fought his way down the steps with a spear and pistol-shot in his right breast, and, as he breathed his last, "he turned to strike his last assailant, half raised his sword to strike, and fell dead with his face to heaven." So say the natives who were present at the last; and as to the esteem in which Gordon was held even by the Mahdists, Mr. Neufeld declares that he never heard a single word against Gordon during the twelve years he spent in the Soudan, nor did he hear one until he came among the General's own flesh and blood.

There is no doubt that Mr. Neufeld was badly treated in the stories which, on the evidence of spies, were believed against him. His obstinacy led to his being treated by the Khaleefa worse than any other of the captives, whereas, had he allowed himself to be "educated," he might have been one of the trusted councillors of the tyrant. But his book is more than a vindication of his conduct in captivity; it is a most valuable addition to the literature of the Soudan, and of the dark days when Khartoum was cut off from the civilised world by the savagery of the Dervishes.

Healing Words.

Faith-Healing and "Christian Science." By Alice Feilding. (Duckworth.)

It was in 1896 that Sir Douglas Galton congratulated an audience of some three hundred people because, "in the heart of this great and sin-burdened London," a fitting temple had been found for "the Christ-Truth that was come to fulfil the whole law." The old Jewish synagogue in Bryanston-street was the fane alluded to, and from that focus the gospel of Mrs. Eddy has been spread abroad. Mrs. Feilding, in a spirit of scientific inquiry, has thought it worth while to make a serious examination of the claims made by the apostles of the new light, and to assay the evidences on which they are based.

Her book is therefore, to describe it very generally, concerned with two principal matters: first, with the parallels which history offers to the remarkable results which are alleged to follow upon the treatment of these mystics—the contrasts and the points of similarity; secondly, with an examination of the written word, with a view to the uncovering of any sound coherent principle which may be obscured by its unfamiliar phraseology.

Of the many historical cases of well-authenticated cures wrought by means that, to empirical science, appear certainly inefficient, one of the most picturesque is the grace believed by many generations to reside in royal hands laid upon the scrofulous. Evelyn thus graphically describes the operation as it might be witnessed in his own day:

His Majesty sitting under his state in the Banqueting House, the Chirurgeons cause the sick to be brought or led up to the Throne, where they kneeling, the King strokes their faces or cheeks with both his hands at once, at which instant a Chaplaine in his formalities said: "He put his hands on them and healed them." This is said to everyone in particular. When they have all been touched they come up again in the same order; and the other Chaplaine kneeling, and having angel-gold strung on white ribbon on his arme, delivers them one by one to his Majesty, who puts them about the necks of the touched as they pass, whilst the first Chaplaine repeats: "That is the true light who came into the world." . . .

In the Middle Ages the Waldenses and Moravians made the immediate cure of disease in answer to prayer an article of faith; George Fox, the founder of the Society of Friends, wrought many cures, according to the testimony of his own Journal; the Jumpers, the Shakers, the Jerkers, the Mormons, and even the sober Methodists, in the days of their first fervour, could allege such Divine interpositions. The Pietist movement in Germany, by the abundance of its prodigies, carried even the Faculty off its feet. Outwardly the methods employed varied; in most cases some kind of prayer or exorcism was used. Valentine Greatrakes, called the Stroker, an old Cromwellian soldier, had it borne in upon him that he could touch efficaciously for the Evil. He set aside three days a week for the exercise of his faculty. His simple method was to lay his hand upon the part affected and to pray: "God Almighty heal thee, for His mercy's sake." He had a vast success, as bishops testified. Mesmer used wands and darkness and frankincense and magnetised trees. If you have a sufficiently impressive manner, you may easily cure a child's warts by solemnly disposing a leaf beneath a stone and assuring him that within a week the leaf and the warts will have vanished away. Such cures, indeed, says Dr. Carpenter, are the best established of all. You may go further afield and find the like phenomena among peoples who have even less in common than Mesmer and George Fox.

But one thing, Mrs. Feilding makes it clear, is common to all these manifestations: they follow upon some kind of rite, or occur amid circumstances fitted to produce in the mind of the patient a strong confidence, and to wind him up to a rigid attitude of expectation. How it happens that such conditions of mind affect nerves and muscles to the point of healing long-established functional disorders, to say nothing of organic mischief, it will be the business of the dissecting-room and the laboratory to find out, if they can; it will provide them with subjects of speculation for generations enough. We cannot follow Mrs. Feilding into her disquisition on Mental Therapeutics, with all the knotted horrors of efferent, afferent, sensori-motor, affero-efferent, of cortical centres and ideational centres, and neuro-physiological interworkings. And we must leave on one side, too, the controversies of the Salpêtrière school, with Charcot at its head, and the school founded by Liébeault at Nancy for the particular study of hypnotic phenomena. It is time to get more closely to Mrs. Eddy.

Christian Science, a Key to the Scriptures, of which she is the author, appeared in 1866, and is now in its 155th edition. The moment when the new gospel was launched was a propitious one. The American public was ripe for a revolt against the prevalent materialism; the inbred reverence for the Bible which, if it had temporarily grown cold, is none the less a part of the national character (as it is of our own), was warming to a second spring; and the rush and racket of the people's incredible activity was bearing a copious harvest of nervous disorders. The half-educated formed nine-tenths, let us say (and a very creditable proportion, as nations go), of the general population; reverent of learning, quite incapable of discriminating it from its ape. And Mrs. Eddy, quite as indiscriminating as any of them, was admirably equipped, by a nodding acquaintance with theology, metaphysics, and science, and the gift of a tenacious and resonant memory, to give them the thing they longed for. Words were Mrs. Eddy's baques, her magnetic tree, her pomp of court, her royal priesthood—words, words, words. Five hundred pages of them in her book. To a reader familiar with the sober use of metaphysical terms, her explanations and her definitions are mere jargon—are the astonishing offspring of a riotous imagination playing, in the light of half-grasped notions gathered at a distance from Hegel or Berkeley or Spinoza or St. Thomas, upon high-sounding, mysterious polysyllables. We must content ourselves with quoting almost at random. Here is—would you believe it?—a definition:

Matter, Mythology, Mortality [synonyms!]; another name for mortal mind; illusion; intelligence, substance and life in non-intelligence and mortality; life resulting in death, and death in life; sensation in the sensationless; mind originating in matter; the opposite of Truth; the opposite of Spirit; the opposite of God; that of which immortal mind takes no cognisance; that which mortal mind [already identified with this mysterious trilogy] sees, feels, tastes, and smells in belief.

Mortal mind plays a great part. It designates, we are luminously told, "something that has no real existence": such things as "passions and appetites, depraved will, envy, deceit, hatred, revenge, disease, death." One conjectures that somebody once told Mrs. Eddy that St. Thomas, following St. Augustine, resolved evil into non-entity; not, of course, in the sense that it had no existence, but in the sense that it is found, upon analysis, to be an absence of good: as poverty is defect of wealth, or pride defect of sound judgment in the comparison of ourselves with our neighbour. A person who can "define" God as "the divine principle" may be depended upon to exemplify most of the possible fallacies of deductive logic. Thus we are told that "the metaphysics of Christian Science prove the rule by inversion." "There is no pain in Truth and [sc. therefore, for it is a proof] there is no truth in pain." She regrets that Ontology receives less attention than Physiology, and relates the following improving anecdote:

It is related that a father, anxious to try such an experiment, plunged his infant babe, only a few hours old, into water for several minutes, and repeated this operation daily, until the child could remain under water twenty minutes, moving and playing without harm, like a fish. Parents should remember this, and so learn how to develop their children properly on dry land.

But why on dry land? And what, in the name of all that is mysterious, does Mrs. Eddy suppose Ontology to mean?

The author of the Key to the Scriptures has been hailed as a teacher "second only to One." It was proper, therefore, that she should give to her disciples a form of prayer and a confession of faith. This is it:

Our Father and Mother God, all-harmonious, Adorable One.

Thy kingdom is come,

Good is ever-present and omnipotent.

Enable us to know—as in Heaven, so in earth—

God is all in all.

Give us grace for to-day; feed Thou the famished affections;

And Divine Love is reflected in love;

And leaveth us not in temptation, but delivereth us from all evil—sin, disease, and death.

For God is omnipresent Good, Substance, Life, Truth, Love.

And here is some part of a prayer proper to a cure of dyspepsia. It was composed by an apostle of the cult:

Holy Reality! We BELIEVE in Thee that Thou art EVERYWHERE present. We really believe it. . . . Forgive us our sins in that we have talked this day about our backaches, that we have told our neighbours that our food hurts us, that we mentioned to a visitor that there was a lump in our stomach, that we have wasted our valuable time . . . in worrying for fear that our stomach would grow worse. . . . We know, Father and Mother of us all, that there is no such thing as a really diseased stomach . . . that the mortal mind is a twist, a distortion, a false attitude, the HARMATIA [blessed word!] of thought . . . Help us to stoutly affirm, with our hand in Your hand, with our eyes fixed on Thee, that we have no Dyspepsia . . . that there is no such thing . . . that there never will be any such thing. Amen.

In fine, what shall we say of Mrs. Eddy and the swarm of rivals and imitators that clusters about her? That they are impostors, charlatans, greedy quacks? God forbid. It is within the range of the most moderate charity to suppose them honest, pious persons, who, in the midst of their extravagancies, act in perfect good faith. It is almost certain that from the means they employ excellent results have issued; that the squadrons and legions of their high-sounding words have very effectively produced the atmosphere that, in accordance with laws unknown, has set free natural forces by which the mind has been able to rectify the misgearings of the bodily organs and to heal their sickness. But their theories (if minds so confused and undisciplined may rightly be credited with a theory) are as loose, as incoherent, as troublous to an inquirer who seeks clear vision as dream stuff.

Mrs. Feilding has done her work well; she is moderate, rational, and patient; but one may be permitted to doubt whether hers is not to a large extent lost labour. She is not likely to persuade the class which the Key to the Scriptures is fit to convince, and which does, in fact, in many cases profit by its application; and the others, above or below it, need no persuasion.

A Fine Artist.

Twelve Portraits. By William Nicholson. (Heinemann.)

To Mr. William Nicholson belongs the credit of introducing a new form of portraiture. We do not mean that he reflected thus: "I will give the public something new, something that will startle them into interest," but that within himself was the impulse to see things in a new way—that is, his own way. In a word, consciously or unconsciously we know not, he turned his back on the past, ignored the schools, and looked with his own eyes. A difficult thing: indeed, of such is the kingdom of genius. The result is the remarkable series of portraits which have been published separately from time to time, and are now issued, with some additions, loose and mounted, in a canvas portfolio of a pleasant green hue. Mr. Nicholson's art is not caricature, although at first glance it might seem so. He just gives us the real man or woman seen in a flash of insight, with that characteristic note that distinguishes one man from another and makes an individual of him. He uses colour sparingly, but always rightly. His figures are alive—when they stand they stand, when they walk they walk, and when they sit they are seated. And he knows how to mass his blacks. He is no flatterer, this observer of the essential; but none of his sitters could object to his presentment of them. We doubt if a truer portrait of the Queen has ever been done than his simple, spacious, dignified drawing. His Mr. Cecil Rhodes is the man himself; how few the lines, yet how they tell. There is a grim integrity about his Archbishop of Canterbury that fascinates and holds the attention. Mark the power in the hands, and how the ink-spilled background helps the composition. The two examples we give carry the reduction in size well, but the inevitable absence of colour takes much from them. Yet, even in the small size, how personal is the Lord Roberts, how deft the arrangement of the battalion in the plain beneath, how fine the sense of distance. And the Mr. Gladstone! Is it not the aged, loose-limbed, dignified statesman himself? Mr. Nicholson is a fine artist. He works in a simple medium, and therein he has won a great reputation.

The Real "Ghetto."

The Ghetto. A Drama in Four Acts, freely adapted from the Dutch of Herman Heijermans, junior. By Chester Bailey Fernald. (Heinemann.)

In the interests alike of his own reputation and that of his author, Mr. C. B. Fernald was well advised in publishing his adaptation of The Ghetto. Not that the play, even in the form in which we may now read it, is a play of the highest significance or value, but it is undeniably more worthy of attention than the mutilated version produced at the Comedy Theatre. Of the alterations in detail we need not speak here. They are sufficiently glaring to strike anyone who has seen the play acted. But there is one alteration which affects the entire atmosphere, the whole framework, of the piece which it is necessary to point out. The Comedy "Ghetto" is dated 1817. The real Ghetto is dated "the present day." It is easy to see how much difference a change of this kind may make in a play of the naturalistic school. The Ghetto strikes the modern note, it is conceived from the standpoint of to-day, its characters use the modern idiom and are in touch with modern ideas. There is a flavour of Herbert Spencer and the Higher Criticism about them. Put them back ninety years and they appear ridiculous. Whether this change of date was made with Mr. Fernald's consent we do not know, but it seems to us to destroy the value of the acted play.

Turning to the drama itself, as we now see it in print, certain merits become clear which were obscured in the acted version, though, on the other hand, certain defects also become prominent. The character of the young Jew Rafael, which was unintelligible in the hands of a melodramatic actor like Mr. Bellew, becomes coherent, or, at least, credible, when considered from the realistic standpoint. Rafael is not a hero commanding the undivided sympathy of the crowd. He is merely a rather conceited young man of coarse fibre finding himself in a situation he has neither the intellect nor the heart to cope with. He is married to his father's Christian servant Rosa. As the hero of a melodrama it is his business to proclaim the fact to his father and the world and go forth a beggar to make his fortune. That is what Mr. Bellew would have liked him to do. The real Rafael is fashioned on quite other lines. "In a month Hanakoff would have played my symphony," he says.

ROSA: Would have! Why not, then?

RAFAEL: Why not? It won't be possible, Rosa.

ROSA: It must be possible! Why not? Why not?

RAFAEL: Well, because the Symphony isn't finished, and in the time when I thought to finish it I shall be working with my hands to keep us from starving. . . .

ROSA: Rafael, you shall not tell your father! . . .

And Rafael consents.

This is not the hero of romance, but the calculating and not very intelligent young Jew. Again, the Rafael who rebukes his father for sordid commercialism and systematic dishonesty while continuing to live on his father's gains and under his father's roof, is scarcely the heroic poseur of Mr. Bellew. In a word, Rafael is not a sympathetic figure. And the same is true of almost every other person in the cast. They are all of them conceived in the unsympathetic vein, and the one really considerable merit of the author's which emerges from an examination of his play is his courage. His character drawing is relentless. He has selected a repulsive environment for his drama—a vulgar, sordid world which, for aught we know, may not in the least resemble the Jewish quarter of Amsterdam. But having chosen it, he selects his characters to fit it. And if the result is not a very agreeable play, it is undeniably a courageous one.

It is curious that a dramatist who could boldly select a repulsive background for his piece, and fill it with repulsive figures, could yet allow himself at times to slip from the realistic into the melodramatic mood. The quieter scenes of the play are all realistic to the last degree, and in a sombre way decidedly effective. But in the more emotional moments realism is flung to the winds, and the action becomes frankly stagey. Rafael finds two young Jews insulting Rosa. From the realistic standpoint this is hardly the moment for farcical absurdities; but Mr. Fernald (or Mr. Heijermans, if the fault be his) becomes frankly farcical. Rafael's interview with Rebecca is equally untrue to life. At times, notably at the end of Act iii., the author's "sense of the theatre" seems to be at fault; but, indeed, this is the weakest act in the play. One word as to the translation. Mr. Fernald was probably right in keeping the style down to the conversational level, though even here in moments of passion a less pedestrian manner might have been used with advantage; but he must guard against his habit of slipping into blank verse. This is excusable, though not always agreeable, in a poetical play such as "The Moonlight Blossom"; but a humble inhabitant of a ghetto would hardly open a conversation with

Fiction.

Gusto.

Little Novels of Italy. By Maurice Hewlett. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

We have before remarked on Mr. Hewlett's joy of living—his gusto; and here again, in his new book, it is his first characteristic. His gusto is immense, enough for himself and all his readers: a gusto that sweeps one into its course like a March wind, and carries one with it. At the beginning of his first story, "Madonna of the Peach-Trees," is a scene of laundry girls washing clothes by the Ponte Navi at Verona. With what an air Mr. Hewlett presents it; with what robust pleasure in the doing!

Having spat into the water many times, rubbed his hands, mopped his head, and cursed most things under heaven and some in it, Master Baldassare found himself watching the laundresses on the shore. They were the usual shrill, shrewd, and laughing line—the trade seems to induce high mirth—and as such no bait for the old merchant by ordinary; but just now the sun and breeze together made a bright patch of them, set them at a provoking flutter. Baldassare, prickly with dust, found them like their own cool linen hung out to dance itself dry in the wind. Most of all, he noticed Vanna, whom he knew well enough, because when she knelt upright she was taller and more wayward than the rest, and because the wind made so plain the pretty figure she had. She was very industrious, but no less full of talk; there seemed so much to say! The pauses were frequent in which she straightened herself from the hips, and turned to thrust chin and voice into the debate. You saw then the sharp angle, the fine line of light along that raised chin, the charming turn of the neck, her free young shoulders and shapely head; also you marked her lively tones of ci and si, and how her slaking finger drove them home. The wind would catch her yellow hair, sometimes, and wind it across her bosom like a scarf; or it streamed sideways like a long pennon; or, being caught by a gust from below, sprayed out like a cloud of litten gold. Vanna always joined in the laugh at her mishap, tossed her tresses back, pinned them up (both hands at the business); and then, with square shoulders and elbows stiff as rods, set to working the dirt out of Don Urbano's surplice. Baldassare brooded, chewing straws. What a clear colour that girl had to be sure! What a lissom rascal it was!

Throughout his work Mr. Hewlett is at this high pressure, as though he wrote at sunrise. Hence a vinous exhilarating book; a book with the rush and merriment of a crisping wave.

Notable is it also for vivid pictorial effects. Italy is the land of colour, and little novels of Italy must have colour too. From beneath any illustrator Mr. Hewlett has cut away the ground, so living are these written pictures; even an illustration in colour would have little left to do. Here is Vanna, for instance, in the story from which we have quoted, "Madonna of the Peach-Trees":

Giovanna, flower in the face as she was, fit to be nose-gay on any hearth, posy for any man's breast, sprang in a very lowly soil. Like a blossoming reed she shot up to her inches by Adage, and one forgot the muddy bed wondering at the slim grace of the shaft with its crown of yellow atop. Her hair waved about her like a flag; she should have been planted in a castle; instead, Giovanna the stately calm, with her billowing line, staid lips, and candid grey eyes, was to be seen on her knees by the green water most days of the week. Bare-armed, splashed to the neck, bare-headed, out-at heels, she rinsed and pommelled, wrung and dipped again, laughed, chattered, flung her hair to the wind, her sweat to the water, in line with a dozen other women below the Ponte Navi.

And in landscape the same colouring hand is at work. Amilcare and Molly's journey to Rome, in "The Duchess of Nona," gives the example:

They made Rome a day or two after . . . ; trailed across the bleached marches (with the Sabine Hills like a blue hem beyond); caught the sun at Cervetri, and entered the dusty town by the Porta Cavallegieri on one of those beaten white noons when the shadows look to be cut out of ebony, and the wicked old walls forbidden to keep still. The very dust seems alive, quivering and restless under heel. St. Peter's Church, smothered in rush mats, was a-building, the marble blocks had the vivid force of lightning; two or three heretic friars were being haled by the Ponte Sant' Angelo to a burning in the Vatican.

But gusto and colour are, after all, only among the minor achievements of a novelist. We are glad to have them, but other qualities must come first. Knowledge of men and a power of conviction are in the van. Mr. Hewlett, in this book, is to seek in both. His stories move royally in that gay and forceful way of his, charming, amusing, stimulating; and there's an end. They do not persuade, they do not satisfy. They remain just entertainment, when we are hoping that the line will be overpassed and a new scene in the human drama displayed. We read them, delight in them, put them down—tales, tales! More, the suspicion creeps upon us that a whole book of such work is beneath Mr. Hewlett's genius: one story, "The Judgment of Borso" say, just to show that in this department of narration he is expert, were sufficient; after that he might bend his mind to something really worthy. For these little novels are superficial at best, not all their author's array of resolute words, not all his gusto, not all his warm colouring, has altered that. Giovanna, Madonna of the peach-trees, pursued from Verona by a hooting rabble, and returning mysteriously at night to be mistaken for the Blessed Virgin and to kindle in the town a blaze of pious fervour; Ippolita, beauty of Padua, so beset by lovers and their absurd ceremonies that she flies to the hills with the goatherds, and mates with the laziest of them; Molly Lovell, daughter of an English wharfinger, in those kissing times which so enraptured Erasmus, forced by an overweening husband to offer poison to Cesar Borgia and dying of her humanity; Monna Selvaggia, beloved of Messer Cino da Pistoja, poet and friend of Dante, but loved only as a poetical idea, not as a reality; and lastly Bellaroba, slim Venetian and child of nature, wed most irregularly to the impudent Angioletto, and winning the favour of the wise Duke Borso—none of these wayward children (for they are little else) do more than please us. Neither they nor their lovers ever convince, ever touch us. Mr. Hewlett has yet to learn the art of so stating a thing that question seems impossible. At present he merely relates, he does not prove. Indeed, in all these narratives of real persons there is less persuasiveness and illusion of reality than in their author's confessedly improbable play of Pan and the Young Shepherd, which still represents his high-water mark.

But pleasing these bubbling stories remain, to a degree seldom if ever attained by any other living writer: even the one or two that end tragically, since, in the absence of the proof of which we have spoken, their gloomy issue hardly touches us. The impression, as a whole, is pleasure unalloyed. Both in variety, in charm, and in fun "The Judgment of Borso" comes first—a dainty, audacious piece of comedy in Mr. Hewlett's own vein. If Angioletto and his Bellaroba remind the reader over much of Prosper le Gai and Isoult la Desirous—well, it is no very serious matter. In adhering to a favourite type of puppet Mr. Hewlett indulges himself in good company.

To sum up, Mr. Hewlett is in no need to strive for tenderer humour or gayer fancy, for increase of gusto or the pictorial gift. These are his in brave profusion. But if he is to do the work which we hope to see from his hand, he must toil hard and continually for a deeper vision of the human heart, and that power of conviction without which the prettiest story in the world is only pretty.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

A SAILOR'S BRIDE.

BY GUY BOOTHBY.

The latest product of Mr. Boothby's incredible phonograph. By way of frontispiece, a sturdy Englishman throttles an Asiatic, with one hand and with the other prevents him from using a gigantic knife. In the end the sailor's bride remarks: "Was it not at sea, and under the most terrible circumstances, that my husband and I learnt to love each other?" Of course it was. (F. V. White. 5s.)

TERENCE.

BY B. M. CROKER.

An Irish novel by a favourite Irish novelist, dedicated to the Irish Tourist Development. An old soldier, Patrick Ryan, talks sagely in a rich brogue. "I was recommended for the Cross," he says; "but I'm drawing sixpence a day instead, and may be it's better. Sure there's not wan hereabouts that knows a V.C. when they sees it, and I feels in me bones as I surely earned it." (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF

ISRAEL PENDRAY.

BY SILAS K. HOCKING.

Cornish Methodism. The hero is converted on page 25 and immediately begins preaching, from which point we have his recollections of evangelical work in Cornwall in the time of Wesley, with whom the hero works. Smuggling and witchcraft and adventure and love enter into the story, which is laid at St. Ives and Redruth. (Warne & Co. 3s. 6d.)

THE PARSON AND THE FOOL.

BY W. WOOLLAM.

The author in his preface quotes the Standard as saying of him that he is "certainly a writer with that real interest in the problems of human character and development which is the first of the novelist's qualifications." The story is a serious study of an unselfish man, never quite able, owing to external conditions, to express himself, to develop on his own lines. (Downey.)

THE RIVAL CHIEFS.

BY S. M. LYNE.

A romance of the Hebrides, opening at the latter end of the last century on an island occupied by two branches of the Clan Maclean who did not mix and rarely crossed the stream that separated their domains. Love and legendry, shipwreck and a gathering of the clans, throw varying colours on the story. (Aberdeen: Moran & Co. 3s. 6d.)

HER PART.

BY A. N. MOUNT ROSE.

A pleasant story of village life considered as an epitome of town life. This is how the Oaks Mansion, newly occupied by the heroine, is rated by the village fathers: "'Whoy, the Hoaks 'as allus bin put in much too low. Net for gross you know. £20, whoy, she be a payin' more'n forty, as I 'ear. Well, neow, if you puts it down at £50, I says 'as 'ow that will take about a fardin' in the pound off your cottages an' moine, down i' Row.' . . . 'Well worth troysin', James—well worth troysin', that is,' and straight down went a note." (Burleigh. 6s.)

BABY WILKINSON'S V.C., AND OTHER STORIES.

BY LIEUT.-COL. N. NEWNHAM-DAVIS.

Eighteen humorous adventure stories of Indian life. One tells how General Bundobast, in "A Regimental Scandal," sighs for the days when "soldiers were soldiers." "'We were as nice a lot of boys . . . as the service has ever seen. There was Jacky Carr . . . and Bobby Fathead, who died of drink at Lucknow; and Jumpy Jameson, who took to tub-thumping, and died a dean or a devil-dodger of some kind or another; and little Billy Cadogan, the most awful little demon on a horse that ever was, and, next to Jameson, the most awful devil with the women that was ever created; and there was myself'—and the old general drew himself up and winked at Admiral Furbelow, who, in return, told him that he was the hottest young fellow that the Almighty ever put breath into." (Downey & Co. 6s.)

AN ENGLISHMAN.

BY MARY L. PENDERED.

A long and very full narrative of life in provincial England—in Mercia, as the author designates it. The "Englishman" is of yeoman stock, a good fellow to the core, but with an escutcheon on which trade has set her alleged smudge. None the less, Maia Lovel, true aristocrat, marries him and is happy. A pretty, leisurely, wholesome book. (Methuen. 6s.)

A FAIR IMPERIALIST.

BY V. J. LEATHERDALE.

A rather self-conscious novel of the day. "I wonder, my harmless, necessary Nell," says Major Carew to his daughter, "if you would fetch me the book I ordered yesterday?" Do majors thus play with Shakespearian phrase? The story, however, is not all affected talk: there is incident, too, and some interesting fencing. (Unwin. 6s.)

THE VALLEY OF SAPPHIRES.

BY MAYNE LINDSAY.

Several short stories, mostly Indian, from the magazines. The first concerns a valley where the children play with sapphires as with pebbles. "It seems an established fact that the Valley of Sapphires is not the fruit of a lively fancy." And yet the Klondike is crowded. (Ward, Lock & Co. 3s. 6d.)

MY DEAR SIR.

BY HARRY B. VOGEL.

Dick Dysart thought it would be a grand thing if his friend Maillard, who had just written a successful play, should marry the lovely daughter of the Duke of Deveron. So he induced Maillard to take a tutorship in the ducal household, to which he (Dysart) had been appointed. "The one thing of all things for Tiny," murmured Dick to himself, "is a sweet, good wife. The idea is redolent of possibilities." Perhaps, but the book is redolent of impossibilities. (Pearsons, Ltd. 3s. 6d.)

PURPLE AND FINE LINEN.

BY W. PIGOTT.

A romance of undergraduates and mystery. In the first chapter is a letter in cipher running thus:

86.5..6.7.7.6.8..1281329.2.
7.3.250212.6.2818..4..5.5.128.
24..802.3.18..282..4.3..8.
5.02.3.187.8.3.0

This, we need hardly say, means:

To-morrow at daybreak. A boat will await. Be watchful. Be true.

Exciting adventures off Scotland follow. (Cassell. 6s.)

THE STEPMOTHER.

BY MRS. ALEXANDER.

Another of Mrs. Alexander's busy stories of pleasant people and love troubles. One of her new characters talks like this: "The extraordinary sympathy with Nature, which some people are so proud of, argues a substratum of sauvagerie, which puts the arts and sciences hors concours." (F. V. White. 6s.)

WAYFARERS ALL.

BY LESLIE KEITH.

A quiet novel, with chapter titles to this pattern: "Walnut Tree Walk," "Gleams of Sunshine," "A Simple Wedding," "Aunt Catherine." (Jarrold. 6s.)

THE ADVENTURES OF A

LADY PEARL-BROKER.

BY BEATRICE

HERON-MAXWELL.

A lady pearl-broker is a lady who sells pearls on commission in society, and runs risks of being robbed of £20,000 worth of jewellery at a time. This is the story of such a lady's adventures. It is not wanting in excitement. (New Century Press.)

A New Lamb Letter.

By the kindness of Mr. George A. Gutch, I am permitted to make public a hitherto-unpublished letter written by Charles Lamb to John Matthew Gutch, his friend and schoolfellow at Christ's Hospital. The missive is valuable as a further illustration of Lamb's freakish mischief, and in adding another to our too slender store of his epistolary hoaxes, the best specimen of which is perhaps the letter to Manning in China, dated Christmas Day, 1815, with its awful list of death's ravages: "Coleridge is just dead, having lived just long enough to close the eyes of Wordsworth," and so forth. The story of the new letter seems to be this: At Midsummer, 1800, by invitation of his old schoolfellow, John Matthew Gutch, Lamb moved with his sister to rooms in a house in Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane (since demolished), where Gutch, with his partner Anderson, carried on the business of a law stationer. Gutch, who was then twenty-five, was at the time courting Miss Wheeley, who became his first wife. Miss Wheeley was the daughter of a coachmaker at Birmingham, whither Gutch had to travel to pursue his suit. Lamb took advantage of one of those visits to make the lover exceedingly uncomfortable by means of the following letter. It is inscribed on foolscap, the first side being closely packed in handwriting which quite suggests that some serious matter is afoot. There is no date. Rob, who is mentioned at the close, was Robert Lloyd, the son of the Quaker banker of Birmingham, and a correspondent of Lamb's:

DEAR GUTCH,—Anderson is not come home, and I am almost afraid to tell you what has happen'd, lest it should seem to have happen'd by my fault in not writing for you home sooner.—

This morning Henry, the eldest lad, was missing, we suppos'd he was only gone out on a morning's stroll, and that he would return, but he did not return and we discovered that he had opened your desk before he went & I suppose taken all the money he could find, for on diligent search I could find none, and on opening your Letter to Anderson, which I thought necessary to get at the key, I learn that you had a good deal of money there. Several people have been here after you to day, and the boys seem quite frightened, and do not know what to do.

In particular, one gentleman wants to have some writings finished by Tuesday—For God's sake set out by the first coach. Mary has been crying all day about it, and I am now just going to some law stationer in the neighbourhood, that the eldest boy has recommended, to get him to come and be in the house for a day or so, to manage. I cannot think what detains Anderson. His sister is quite frightened about him. I am very sorry I did not write yesterday, but Henry persuaded me to wait till he could ascertain when some job must be done (at the furthest) for Mr. Foulkes, and as nothing had occurred besides I did not like to disturb your pleasures. I now see my error, and shall be heartily ashamed to see your

[That is as far as the letter goes on the first page. We then turn over, and find (as Gutch to his immense relief found before us) written right across both pages:]

A Bite!!!

Anderson is come home, and the wheels of thy business are going on as ever. The boy is honest, and I am thy friend.

And how does the coach-maker's daughter? Thou art her Phaeton, her Gig, and her Sociable. Commend me to Rob.

C. LAMB.

Saturday.

It is a pity that this is the only letter from Lamb to Gutch, with the exception of the one printed by Canon Ainger, dated April 9, 1810, that has been preserved. But all, or nearly all, of his papers were destroyed; with those of Lamb perishing, in all probability, many equally characteristic letters of Coleridge.

"All the Newest Books."

By a Quiet Man.

I DESIRE, as a plain man who loves his books, to exclaim a little on the Autumn Season. Have you seen the publishers' lists—yards and yards of announcements? Such alluring books, too; such pressing invitations! At first I was happy, saying: "This I will read, and this." But as I went on and on, as each choice was discounted by a better, as each vista fell away in a longer perspective, I grew dizzy and rebellious. Why this annual Sturbridge Fair of new books? Why this combined assault of the publishers on the reading Ego, and on all the precious loyalties of one's bookshelves? For it comes to that: one cannot read old books and new when the new come in myriads and all stepping together. It were useless to complain: this seasonal way of publishing and reading books is fixed among us; nor will I presume to lecture those who go to the Fair. I go myself. There is no resisting the blaze and the din.

I go, but one feels the disproportion between the huge output of even one autumn season and the little heap of books that will keep a man happy all his life. Books!—why even a few phrases, even tags and snatches of glorious verse which a man may write in his pocket-book, or carry in his head, are, if they have passed into the blood, wealth beyond the dreams of librarians. There was a boy at my old school who used to approach me in the dormitory with an intense gaze, and deliver himself, in a whisper, of the words—"Black Auster!" I thought him mad, until he grew more liberal and took me by the throat with Macaulay's verse:

The furies of thy brother
With me and mine abide,
If one of your accursed house
Upon black Auster ride!

A few years later we were roasting chestnuts in a garret, with London at our feet, and with Horace—Francis's Horace (with all the first lines in Latin)—to savour our young pessimism. I hear him rolling out the last verse of the Ode to Postumus:

Then shall your worthier heir discharge
And set th' imprison'd casks at large,
And dye the floor with wine,
So rich and precious, not the feasts
Of holy pontiffs cheer their guests
With liquor more divine.

It cheered us immensely to talk of "old Falernian," and drink weak tea, in those days. Well—my friend is the truest reader and lover of books that I know, and yet I should not meagrely sum up his past and present reading if I named only six writers: Macaulay (the Lays), Horace

(the Odes), Herrick, Malory, Scott, and Thackeray. To him the autumn publishing season is scarcely more than the wind that stirs the trees in his garden, "and they do make no noise." Yet new books reach him, and he can praise a hopeful writer or damn a "boomster" on as good grounds as you shall desire. Few mistakes are made in that house—in that house of wise prejudice. It is becoming rare to meet the man of one book. Yet I knew a bank clerk, who confided to me that his only poet was—Shenstone. And I knew a tea traveller who, when you lured him from politics, would kindle and confess that he had read Paradise Lost many times; but I could not find that he remembered more than five words of the poem. They were in the Sixth Book, in the passage where the Father surveys the doubtful battle of the angelic hosts, and commands the Son to end the conflict "since none but Thou can end it." I can see H— leaning forward in his arm-chair, all the man tendered and aflame, shaking a monitory finger as he cited the tremendous injunction:

Bring forth all my WAR.

Then, triumphing and fatigued, he would sink back, waving a hand, putting you at a distance, and warning you, as it were, not to say "How grand!"—since even to agree with him were a kind of levity! And once I supped with a poet who said to me: "There are two passages in all poetry which I find sovran for a black mood." "Repeat them." "The first is from 'Othello':

Not poppy, nor mandragora,
Nor all the drowsy syrups of the world,
Shall ever medicine thee to that sweet sleep
Which thou owedst yesterday."

"And the second?" "The second is from Milton—you know the lines—Comus is recommending his cup to the Lady—none so potent, he tells her, to stir up joy,

Not that Nepenthes, which the wife of Thone
In Egypt gave to Jove-born Helena."

What is all the hurly-burly of the Book-Mart to such moments and such preferences!

Preferences!—we need the word. Our critics hie up and down, saying "Lo, here!" and "Lo, there!"—but the man who only reads what he will, and loves what he reads, is apt to prove a good bookman. I looked into Chadwick's Life of Defoe the other day—a fantastic book—and was reminded of Lamb's indictment of Defoe's Complete English Tradesman, which he said he could burn for its tendency "to narrow and degrade the heart." Not so Mr. Chadwick: after enumerating all Defoe's works, not omitting the Journal of the Plague and Robinson Crusoe, he pronounces the Complete English Tradesman to be Defoe's masterpiece, and second to no work in the English language. Foolish! Well, but that is the way to love books, and all such solitary choosings and loyalties have a charm. Their genuineness is above suspicion. That is a sweet story that Hazlitt tells of Mr. Fearn, the tiger hunter, who "was buried in the woods of Indostan." He took a whim, and wrote a metaphysical book, and put it in his boat, and said, as he floated down the Ganges: "If I live, this will live: if I die, it will not be heard of." When the book was printed it fell dead from the Press; no one wanted it. But to the end of his life (he was buried in the woods of Indostan) Mr. Fearn used to say, "There was a sensible writer in the Monthly Review who saw the matter in its proper light."

That man is best fitted to buy new books in a crowd who reads old ones in his room. His judgment is encased by an atmosphere of memories and preferences through which only books of real pretension can win their way. Unhappy the man who goes into the book-mart without prejudices derived from a few good old books, long loved, and often read. With such tests and touchstones about us we may welcome the biggest "Autumn Season." Z.

Things Seen.

Renunciation.

To a valley by the sea—green, sheltered, secluded—came on this day for a picnic a score of shy pupil-teachers from a neighbouring training college. It also happened that on the same day fourteen seminarists from a neighbouring Roman Catholic training college came over in a brake to picnic in the green valley. I, who was walking by the sea, saw the black-coated, self-conscious seminarists arrive; saw them arrange a cloth on the sward; saw them spread their luncheon, tuck the tails of their black coats beneath them, and seat themselves, tailor-wise, for the repast. Hardly had they begun when a char-à-banc containing the young women appeared at the entrance of the valley. They too spread a cloth, at a discreet distance, and it seemed as if the luncheon parties were to proceed sedately and pleasantly, when cries of dismay arose from a group of pupil-teachers who were rummaging in the char-à-banc!

The luncheon-basket had been left behind.

Slowly, dejectedly, those who had been searching for the basket joined their companions around the table-cloth—spotless, bare, reproachful. Feminine lamentations swept through the peaceful valley. The seminarists gazed at the woe-begone maidens, and, as they gazed, a common thought moved through them, more searching than pity or condolence, something of that primordial instinct their training and vows had not wholly eradicated—the desire of man to comfort the Fair in distress. The impulse moved through them; then, as one man, they rose to their feet, bowed awkwardly to the young women, and, by means of nods and vague pointings, they offered what was meant to be an invitation to accept their repast. Then they scrambled to their feet and disappeared in a long black line over the sunlit sandhill.

Heroism.

FIVE friends—three men and two women—were staying at a small unfrequented place on the coast. It was their custom to bathe together at noon, but one day, as it happened, the bachelor of the party, who, on the analogy that among the blind the one-eyed is king, was also the best swimmer, was some minutes late at the bathing tents. His friends were already in the water. It was a temperate day, and before undressing he stood awhile on the crest of the shingly beach watching them sporting in the shallows of the tide, some fifty yards below. Also he saw, some distance out to sea, a black head bobbing on the waves. The swimmer was a venturesome distance from the shore, and the man thought, with some apprehension and not a little annoyance, "If he calls for help, I should have to—to—to save him. Whew!"

The thought drummed through his brain while he was undressing, troubling him; for, like most of us, he was at heart timid; but he had considered the matter and decided that should fate ever put him to the ordeal there could be but one course—some show of heroism at any cost. The obsession passed: soon he was stepping out into the sunshine, prepared to run gaily down the beach. But, as he came out of the tent, he saw in one swift, comprehensive glance, that his friends were no longer in the water: they were gathered in a group on the shore, gesticulating, beckoning wildly to him.

He looked out over the waters. The black head bobbing on the waves was no longer visible. The thought dinned in his head: "It has come, then!" and he staggered there in the sunshine.

His friends were still gesticulating and beckoning from the beach, and for a moment he was angry—angry that they should so unanimously, so insistently, relegate the task to him. But the effort to save this man's life must be made: he must make it. That rushed with his blood. Then his eye caught sight of a boat a stone's-throw away, an old boat, swathed in canvas from gunwale to gunwale against the winter. Here was a compromise, an honest one, for he was not a good swimmer, and there and back with a body in tow, why it meant drowning; but here was a compromise. He raced along the shingle, the flints cutting his feet, tore and tugged and dragged at the canvas till it all lay in shreds on the ground, and then, the voices of his friends ringing in his ears, with a supreme call on his strength, he ran the old boat down the shelving beach, and plunged breathless, bleeding, wild-eyed into the midst of his friends. "What are you doing?" they cried. "Doing! doing!" he shouted, "he's drowning!"

"Seals, don't drown!" said one.

"Seals?"

"Yes, we shouted to you to come and look at a seal. It came quite close to us. Such a dear."

The Amateur Critic.

[From time to time we receive letters from correspondents in praise or disapproval of books new and old. Hitherto we have not made these amateur criticisms public, but in future, for awhile, beginning with this week, we propose to put a page of the ACADEMY at the service of the unprofessional commentator. To this page we also invite our readers to contribute remarks on striking or curious passages which they may meet with in their ordinary reading. No communication, we would point out, must exceed 300 words.]

A Forgotten Author.

Miss Hannah Lynch's graceful and, to me, very welcome paper on "A Forgotten Notable Novel" recalls to my mind an amusing experiment which was once tried by Mr. W. E. Henley in the columns of his famous National Observer. Instead of the usual batch of trenchant reviews, one week the editor declared that, as no books of importance had been published, he would fill up his pages with notices of some old ones. Thereupon books by such authors as Sir Walter Scott, Disraeli, and Thackeray were dealt with in true National Observer style. Now, it has occurred to me that when you are more than usually beset by the influx of new books, you might afford a pleasing contrast to your contemporaries by devoting your pages, or some of them, to reviews of a few old books. It is true that in the general way reprints of classical works get noticed, but in such cases the reviewer—if he calls attention to more than the format and print of the edition—turns out a very vague style of essay. Surely if Miss Lynch's example were followed, and some of the many books of merit that have been allowed too long to lie neglected were reviewed, not because they had been reprinted, but because they deserved to be known, a genuine service would be rendered to the reading public. May I mention the name of the Rev. C. R. Maturin, whose novels and plays, seventy years ago, were not only suggestive to Sir Walter Scott, but undoubtedly influenced Victor Hugo and Honoré de Balzac, and generally did much for the romantic movement in France? In two of his novels, entitled The Wild Irish Boy and Women, issued respectively in 1808 and 1818, Maturin gives us early and not unsuccessful examples of the psychological romance. It would be a profitable undertaking to review these books in the light of modern thought. In Melmoth the Wanderer, which was re-issued by Messrs. Bentley some seven years ago, the public had an opportunity, which I fear it did not appreciate, of making the acquaintance of one phase of the work of this writer.

Charles Wells's Stories.

A short time ago I chanced, in a second-hand book-shop, upon a copy of Charles Wells's very little-known Stories after Nature. The volume was neatly bound, its pages of hand-made paper were uncut, and its general air of freshness indicated at once that it was no second-hand book at all, but of the class that is known as "remainders." Its title-page gave 1891 as the date of publication, and showed that it was one of a limited edition of four hundred numbered copies. I was on the point of returning it to its place when my eye was arrested by the names "Rossetti" and "Swinburne" in the preface. Evidently this Charles Wells, whose name was entirely strange to me, was not, as I had supposed, one of your fine amateur men of letters who literally give the world the laboured results of half a lifetime of dainty toying with the pen. I paid the shilling demanded and the book became mine. My purchase, I found, was a volume of imaginative stories, full of the highest poetic feeling, and touched with a quaint old-world mannerism that had an indescribable charm. The preface, written by Mr. W. J. Linton, stated that the author was the Wells mentioned by Keats in his sonnet to a friend who sent him roses, and that the stories were first published anonymously in 1822. Their republication, I gathered, was due to just such an accident as that which had brought the volume into my possession. Mr. Linton had found the book on a bookstall, and he and his friends (among them D. G. Rossetti), to whom he showed it, immediately perceived its merit. "Rossetti," he says, "was minded to illustrate some of the stories." And Mr. Swinburne, who had it from Rossetti, found it "perfect in grace and power, tender and exquisite in choice of language, full of a noble and masculine delicacy in feeling and purpose." And yet with it all, the book is comparatively unknown. One can only wonder at the irony of fate that has allowed this gem of literature to fade from the memory of men.

A Striking Book for Children.

I do not remember any extended notice in your own columns, or indeed anywhere, of a book which I do not hesitate to associate in the closest intimacy on my shelves with The Water Babies and Bevis and Mr. Stillman's Billy and Hans. This may seem extravagant praise, but The Story of a Red Deer, by the Hon. W. J. Fortescue, is so admirably told, is so full of the most intimate knowledge of nature, and presents so perfectly for both great and little children the life of the moors and the forests, that the judgment is just. Here, in pages which reveal the artist as well as the naturalist, is delicately drawn the life history of one of our last really wild animals from his baby calthood up to the later years of the proud stagship. Incidentally, also, across the story come other wild things—the rabbit, the badger, the fox—all touched off with the charm and fancy which one too often misses in kindred attempts. Mr. Fortescue may not repeat such work as this, but he takes his place with Kingsley, Kipling, and Jefferies in that rare circle to whom nature has shown some of her secrets.

The Howling Cheese.

Will you kindly use your valuable influence to persuade a publisher to give us a sixpenny edition of Herman Melville? I am equally tired of hearing this writer praised, and of having no opportunity of reading him. In your last number Stevenson is at it again: Melville is "a howling cheese" is his phrase—a howling cheese meaning, I take it, a howling swell. I have been reading books (with a special leaning towards those of the howling cheeses) for many years now, but never has a copy of Omoo, or Typee, or anything else of Melville's, come my way. I doubt not that there are various editions, but they must be strangely inaccessible. There cannot be one at sixpence, which is the new figure.

A Great Undertaking.*

The World's Literature in Twenty Volumes.

SOMETHING is to be done at last to relieve the embarrassment of the immense number of people who want to read wisely and widely, but are discouraged by the extent of the field and their inability to choose. Heretofore attempts have been made to meet their case, but none of them have taken account of the sturdy ambition of the inquirers, whose wish it is to survey, and in some degree explore, the entire field of literature from the earliest times down to the present day. Clearly no "hundred books" can give the needful point of vantage, or, to vary the metaphor, a hundred hand-shakes with the literature of the world are not enough. A wider, and a more sympathetic and catholic, acquaintance is desired.

The means to such an acquaintance seems likely to be provided in The Library of Famous Literature which the Standard is about to issue to all who will avail themselves of its enterprise. In twenty large volumes we are offered "the distilled essence of sixty centuries of books."

It would be a sorry farce to throw such a collection before the public without providing an orderly arrangement of the selections, and some direct critical assistance. No such mistake has been made. The control of the series has been given to Dr. Richard Garnett, whose release from the Chief Librarianship of the British Museum is thus turned to the advantage of a wider reading public. With him are associated Prof. Brandl, of Berlin, M. Léon Vallée, Librarian of the Bibliothèque Nationale of Paris, and Mr. Donald G. Mitchell, better known as "Ik Marvel," who is responsible for the selections from American literature. We have next a strong corps of interpreters and critics, who provide introductory studies or essays on such periods and phases of literature as seem to require elucidation. This is an admirable feature of the work, and the list of names given inspires every confidence. Thus Mr. Henry James sketches the "Rise of the Novel" to its present position and attempts a forecast of its future. That eminent French critic, Ferdinand Brunetière, writes on "French Poetry," especially the poetry of the nineteenth century. Maurice Maeterlinck writes on the "Development of the Drama since Shakespeare." Armando Palacio Valdès, the Spanish novelist, has something to say on the "Decadence of Modern Literature." Sir Walter Besant discusses "Novels that have made History." Paul Bourget writes upon a topic close to his chosen field, "The Evolution of Literary Criticism" at the hands of Sainte-Beuve, Taine, and Matthew Arnold. Bret Harte, pioneer of the American short story, writes on "The Rise of the Short Story." Emile Zola contributes a militant essay on "Naturalism and Romanticism"; Dr. Edward Dowden on "The Elizabethan Era and its Influence on English Literature"; Dean Farrar on "The Literature of Religious Apologia and Criticism"; Comte E. Melchior de Vogüé on "The Great Years of Russian Literature"; Prof. Pasquale Villari, of Florence, on "The Renaissance and the Beginning of Modern Literature"; Mr. Donald G. Mitchell on "The Greater Literature of the World"; Dr. Henry Smith Williams on "The Literature of Science," and Mr. Andrew Lang on "The Progress of Literature in the Nineteenth Century"—all these render service which must prove valuable to readers and to serious students. Indeed, the advance proofs we have seen of many of these articles enable us to say that this will be so.

An important point is, that under each period the reader will find not only writings which belong to it in point of time, but also any writings which throw light on the period, though they may have been written centuries later. This is an excellent plan, for most readers like to be guided by writers whom they have learned to trust. To take an example, under the age of Homer will be found extracts from Matthew Arnold's lectures on translating Homer.

The result achieved by the application of these principles and methods is best judged by taking up a volume of The Library at random. Here is Volume IV. It opens with Gibbon's narrative of the capture of Jerusalem, from the Decline and Fall. Next we have Edward Fairfax's rendering of Tasso's account of Godfrey of Boulogne in Jerusalem Delivered. Then "Richard and Saladin," from Scott's Talisman, followed by a humorous interlude from Barham's Ingoldsby Legends: "A Legend of Palestine and—West Kent." "The Tournament" from Ivanhoe follows, and is succeeded by a noble passage from the "Nibelungenlied," introducing a long series of romantic compositions. Mr. Lang's translation of Aucassin and Nicolette, Mrs. Oliphant's account of "The Fourth Crusade," in Makers of Venice, and the Rhythm of Bernard de Morlaix lead up to a lecture on "Village Life in England Six Hundred Years Ago," by Mr. Augustus Jessop. Turning the later leaves of this volume we find Robin Hood Ballads, passages from Dante's Inferno, and from the Decameron, from Froissart's Chronicle, from Pilpay's Fables, and from the Memoirs of Philippe de Comines. Even this glance into one volume is enough to show that the main object of the work has been steadily kept in view.

In turning to other volumes we notice scores of passages—not snippets, but lengthy passages—from works which almost every reader has desired at one time or another to be acquainted with. The Adventures of Captain John Smith, the Virginian pioneer, is a curious and fascinating book, but it is not a book which the general reader would be likely to purchase. Here he may taste its quality in twenty-four goodly pages. Then, again, what reader will not be grateful for Captain Alfred T. Mahan's expert account of the Battle of Trafalgar from his Life of Nelson? Beckford's Vathek, of which Byron said "Rasselas must bow before it," is another work eminently suitable for excerpt treatment.

To sum up, Dr. Garnett, whose association with the work inspires confidence, thinks that "the time seems ripe for a reversion to the principle which gave to classical literature its glory and its life—the sentiment that the highest excellence should be aimed at, and hence for a revival of the Greek ideal of an anthology—a 'gathering of flowers,' which is, after all, translated into broader scientific language, but Darwin's formula of the survival of the fittest. It is out of this idea that the present work has sprung. If the execution corresponds to the idea, if it is a true gathering of flowers, it should aid in protecting our literature . . . from an entirely novel danger in the dependence of the most popular, and therefore the most influential, authors upon a wide general public neither refined nor intelligent, who now, as dispensers of the substantial rewards of literature, occupy the place formerly held by the Court, the patron, and the university. Hence a serious apprehension of a general lowering of the standard of literature, far more pernicious than any temporary aberration of taste. The evil may be combated by anthologies, which, if not themselves unduly tolerant of inferior work, may do much good by familiarising the reader with what is excellent in the present, and reminding the writer of the conditions on which alone fame may be won in the future."

The Library of Famous Literature—which, we should add, is illustrated throughout in excellent style—makes good its claim to be a compact and representative display of the literature of the world.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

AMONG the many things for which we may still be thankful in the recent great crisis of France is the unexpected revelation of fine and noble characters. The heroes of the Affaire are now household names all the world over, awaiting the full honours of posterity. But we were hardly prepared for such a wonderful transformation as that of the elegant scoffer, M. Anatole France. His delightful wit and wisdom, his large and benevolent satire, showed him the servant of reason—above prejudices. In the face of the dire and wicked imbecility of those in exalted places we expected nothing more from Anatole France than a contemptuous shrug, an ironical chapter or two in his delicious volumes of contemporary history. Esterhazy we felt to have been specially fashioned for the pen of Anatole France, and so, when the Année d'Améthyste appeared, the delicate ironist had fulfilled our just expectations. But since then how much he has surpassed them! The forthcoming volume, concerning M. Bergeret in Paris, will contain pages as noble, as elevated and austere, as any written by the gravest and most spiritual of writers. Not a hint of mockery, not a suspicion of the old adorable perfidy which makes up so large a measure of M. France's charm. The gravity and mournfulness of the hour have reformed our old rakish friend, and behold him spiritualised, ennobled, wearing our common brand of sorrow and humbled amazement! He has ceased to laugh at the French generals. He remembers that he, too, is French, and that, as a Frenchman his heart is torn and bleeding. I know of no finer piece of writing, breathing a subdued sadness, a pity as deep and noble on behalf of France as on behalf of her irreparably wounded victim, than his letter from Holland to M. Bergeret after the verdict. A little while earlier his beautiful tribute to Colonel Picquart had come to us as dew in the desert, but on reading this austere, resigned, and solemnly patriotic essay on the verdict, we felt that Anatole France had entered a brighter sphere than even that of action, and has proved the mightier force of an honest pen than a dishonoured sword, with its momentary dishonouring victory.

The mood has passed, and now we find him back in his quaint and enchanting humour. The conspiracy has roused him out of his mournful meditations, and we have a new chapter of contemporary history in one of this week's Figaros. Those who know anything of reactionary and Nationalist French society will joyously recognise the marvellous accuracy of this sentence, which hits off the quality of the modern conspirators to the life:

Belonging to good society, they were all Nationalists. The Baron Wallstein as much as the rest. An Austrian Jew, set fleeing by the Viennese Anti-Semites, he had established himself in France, where he founded a big Anti-Semite newspaper and took refuge in the Church and army. M. de Terremonde, small aristocrat and small proprietor, showed exactly as much military and clerical enthusiasm as was necessary to identify himself with the titled society in which he moved. The Gromance had too much interest in the re-establishment of the Monarchy not to desire it sincerely. Their pecuniary situation was embarrassed. Madame de Gromance, pretty, well-made, free to act as she liked, could manage; but Gromance, who was no longer young, and had reached the age when we need security, comfort, and consideration, sighed for better times, and impatiently waited the coming of the king. He counted on being named a peer of France by Philippe restored. He laid claim to an arm-chair in the Luxembourg, and placed himself among Meline's Republicans, whom the king would be obliged to pay. The young Lacrisse was president of the Royalist youth of the department where the Baronne had lands and the Gromance had debts. In front of the little table placed under the foliage, in the rose-tinted candle light in which the butterflies danced, these five persons were united in one thought, happily expressed by Joseph Lacrisse: "We must save France."

Gromance explains that he had been that day to the Senate. Remembering the comfortable velvet seats and his desire for one of them, he cries out again in the sincerity of his conviction: "Save France! Let us save France!" And this is the résumé of Nationalist patriotism.

The intensity of emotions through which we have been living here for the past two years, culminating in the fever of suspense, had made the reading of fiction an insipid and tasteless occupation. What could the novelists, even with the combined imagination of a dozen of the best, offer us to compare with the consuming interest of the daily papers? Life has become too dramatic, too tragic, too surprising for the woes and surprises of fiction to entertain us. And so I welcome, as the opening of the publishing season, an erudite, brightly-written book about the "libertines" of France in the seventeenth century, by M. Perrens, of the Institute. M. Perrens uses the term libertine in its scholarly sense, which means something of a freethinker and a freelance. The word gradually came to convey what it means to-day, owing first to the insane conviction in devout persons that an unbeliever is necessarily a rake, and then to the steady demoralisation of the libertines. They thought they might as well earn and justify their evil reputation. But imagine dubbing "libertine" an austere puritan because he chose to think for himself! Though M. Perrens explains that the early interpretation of libertinage was incredulity, he cannot conceal that the word even then went further in its definition, and allied moral with doctrinal imputations. M. Perrens justly protests against the monstrous abuses of the school historians. An early school prize of mine was the life of the great Condé, wherein the hero of Rocroi was depicted as one of the most perfect and most glorious of men. Why should boys or girls be brought up on such lies? The great Condé was a gallant soldier, but a creature of infamous life, without a single redeeming feature except his courage. "One does not deny, one only glides over the enormities," says M. Perrens. "Should one be constrained to mention them, one does so with red-heeled lightness: simple venial sins. In veiling paternal nudities, we are aided by the distance of time and space: the vices of Socrates and Condé do not shock us as do those of our contemporaries."

M. Perrens is hard on the culte of Victor Cousin, the great ladies of the seventeenth century, who were certainly what we should describe to-day as "a very bad lot." I have not space to say more about an extremely interesting and closely-packed volume, but I must refer the reader—for the play of words would be entirely lost in translation—to Marigny's description of Guillaume de Bautin, one of Richelieu's intimates. As a summary of falseness of character it is delicious.

H. L.

THE modern appreciation of Donne seems to begin with Robert Browning, who met with the poems when he was still a boy (about 1827), and was greatly influenced by them. He put the Mandrake song to music. He quoted and praised the Dean so constantly in later years that Miss Barrett noticed it early in their acquaintance; "your Donne," she says on several occasions. The stamp of the Dean's peculiar intensity of feeling can be traced in many of Browning's lyrics; his famous "obscurity" is closely analogous to Donne's. Of subsequent instances of the influence of Donne on English poetry this is hardly the place to speak.—From Mr. Edmund Gosse's Life and Letters of Donne, published this week.

Studies in Contemporary Style.

1.—The Relative Pronoun.

The public, no less than the immediate personal friends of Mr. Blank Blank will regret to learn that it has been found necessary to perform another operation on his eyes, which everybody will join in hoping will completely restore his sight to him.—THE DAILY CHRONICLE.

Another object, scarcely less important, is the overthrow of that military jurisdiction which, as M. de Pressensé shows, has so black a history in France.—THE DAILY CHRONICLE.

The Bill, which was to prove the magnum opus of the late Premier's career, which was to place the relations of Great Britain and Ireland upon a basis of permanent goodwill and amity, had been fought stage by stage through the Lower House.—THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

THE last clause in our first quotation illustrates an error that is common in speech and in writing. At first we feel which to be placed in the objective by one or another of the verbs that follow; but it is not so. The pronoun is nominative to will restore. This discovery, however, only leads us to perceive the typical error. The predicate misstates the writer's meaning. He has no more than a hope that the operation will restore Mr. Blank's sight; yet, when we leave out the subordinate clause intervening between the nominative and the predicate, he says absolutely that it will. The writer may argue that the error is the printer's. He may say that there should have been a comma after which and a comma after hoping. The commas would serve only to make the error glaring. With the commas in use, the sentence, as we have said, would predict absolutely the success of the operation; and that would not be what the writer meant.

A ready method of finding whether a relative pronoun in an involved sentence is in proper relation to the predicate is to read the sentence with the words between the pronoun and the predicate left out. This will be perceived in an examination of our other excerpt from the Daily Chronicle. With as M. de Pressensé shows left out, the sentence would still be correct.

The truth seems to be that the erring writer suffers from the common fallacy that short sentences are bad style. He had two facts to express, and should have written two sentences. He should have written thus:

Mr. Blank Blank finds it necessary to have another operation on his eyes. The public, as well as his personal friends, will hope for its complete success.

We do not regard that as a particularly graceful statement. All we say is that it is a correct expression of the facts with which the writer supplies us.

The sentence from the Quarterly Review exemplifies an error not less common than that of the writer in the Daily Chronicle. Observe that the reviewer repeats the relative pronoun. The first result is that on the second use the pronoun seems relative to career, which is not the case. Another result is that the sentence is both ungrammatical and ungainly. In such a sentence the copulative conjunction is intended to connect verbs. It is never intended to connect pronouns. Repetition of the relative pronoun, therefore, is invariably bad style. The sentence should run thus:

The Bill which was to prove the magnum opus of the late Premier's career, by placing the relations of Great Britain and Ireland upon a basis of permanent goodwill, had been fought stage by stage through the Lower House.

It will be noticed that we have left out the comma after Bill. We have done so in order to draw attention to a third error in connexion with the relative pronoun. Following a usage which was general until the middle of this century, the printer of the Quarterly Review still inclines to put a comma before every relative pronoun. Consequently, he destroys the distinction between the restrictive relative and the relative absolute, and thus deprives writers of a necessary means towards exact expression. The author of the sentence that we have quoted meant the relative to be restrictive. By using the comma the printer made it absolute, and left the sentence both inaccurate and limp.

Certain authorities on grammar say that the true restrictive relative is that. They maintain that which and who should be used as relative absolutes only. This is the house that Jack built is certainly better than This is the house which Jack built. It is equally clear that The man that broke the bank of Monte Carlo is better than The man who broke the bank. Still, we are not willing to go so far as the authorities to whom we have alluded. In this writing we have followed their precept; but there are many cases in which that instead of who or which as the restrictive relative would be exceedingly clumsy. We could not well use it, for example, in the first line of the Lord's Prayer.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE Earl of Cranbrook, who has just kept his eighty-fifth birthday, belongs to a past generation of politicians. He follows, however, with close interest each new move in that game of politics in which he was once so bold a player. Nobody fought a better battle in bygone days than Mr. Gathorne-Hardy. He belonged, moreover, to a type rarer in the Tory party of thirty years ago than it is to-day. He was a partner in the Low Moor Iron Works; and a Conservative manufacturer was almost as rare at that time as a Conservative working-man. The party did not want to be aristocratic for ever, and Lord Beaconsfield, who had witnessed and reckoned with the rise of the manufacturing communities, brought Coningsby face to face with Mr. G. O. A. Head, of Stalybridge in fiction, and sought out such men in real life for his colleagues in the Cabinet. Mr. Gathorne-Hardy made a good Home Secretary, a good Secretary of State for India, and a good Secretary of State for War. When he rose to defend the Established Church in Ireland, he did so with the double fervour of a political partisan and of a convinced Churchman, and his speeches in opposition to Mr. Gladstone's Bill were among the most impassioned ever heard in the House of Commons. Of course, his career carried within itself the seeds of its own destruction. The "Manchester man" became the Londoner; the manufacturer was lost in the politician, and the democrat in the aristocrat.

THE Duke of Argyll, in committing Iona to the custody of representatives of the Church of Scotland, will be saved a slight yearly expenditure on its preservation. Old monks and modern elders may not seem an exactly happy conjunction; but Iona has other than religious memories, it has its close association with one of the greatest passages of English prose:

We were now treading [wrote Dr. Johnson] that illustrious island which was once the luminary of the Caledonian regions, whence savage clans and roving barbarians derived the benefits of knowledge and the blessings of religion. To abstract the mind from all local emotion would be impossible if it were endeavoured, and would be foolish if it were possible. Whatever withdraws us from the power of our senses, whatever makes the past, the distant, or the future, predominate over the present, advances us in the dignity of thinking beings. Far from me and from my friends be such frigid philosophy as may conduct us indifferent and unmoved over any ground which has been dignified by wisdom, bravery, or virtue. The man is little to be envied whose patriotism would not gain force on the plains of Marathon, or whose piety would not grow warmer among the ruins of Iona.

THE name of Mr. Percy Pilcher has to be added to the long roll of martyrs who have perished in their attempts to increase man's facilities of locomotion. The flying-machine belongs, no doubt, to the twentieth century; the nineteenth, with its own triumphs, needs not to snatch at it. Percy Pilcher was an enthusiast literally indifferent to his life, so only he could carry further the powers of human flight. On Saturday afternoon he was surrounded by friends, bidden by Lord and Lady Braye to one of their fields near Stanford Hall, to see his ascent on his eagle-like craft. The weather was all against him; and a more prudent man than Percy Pilcher would have abstained from making the attempt. His was fatal good nature. He did not like to let people who had come to be amused go away bored. So at last he strove to mount, and had got about thirty feet high when the gust of wind came which dislocated his machine and him. The Hon. Everard Feilding, who was one of the first of the horrified onlookers to run forward and raise the bruised body of his friend, sent a full account of the affair to his brother, Lord Deubigh, who is now on duty as Lord-in-Waiting at Balmoral, so that the Queen might be fully and privately informed, as she always likes to be. Lord Braye, who is something of a poet and something of a theologian, thinks of raising a Pilcher monument in his park, with an inscription which his own pen is particularly well fitted to supply.

CERTAINLY not a tactician is the politician who this week declared that the opposition to war in South Africa had its origin, not in any love of peace, but in the mere hatred of one man, Mr. Chamberlain, who, &c. No panegyric which followed could make up to Mr. Chamberlain for the thrust unintentionally and clumsily conveyed in such a statement; as when Rogers, reproached by a lady for not coming to her aid over some trifle, assured her, with unconscious cruelty: "I pass my life in defending you."

LEO XIII., though not nearly so accessible as Pius IX. was to pilgrims and visitors, has, nevertheless, granted audiences to a large number of English Protestants even. He is first of all ready to put himself out to receive French people; then English people; then the peoples of Italy, Spain, and others; but Germans last of all. The other day, Lady Sophia Palmer, the daughter of the late Lord Chancellor Selborne, had a talk with the Pope, in which she told him that an uncle of hers, William Palmer, long dead, had joined the Roman Catholic Church, though she herself remained in "the Anglican branch." Leo XIII. smiled very paternally, and said a great many very agreeable things for an English lady to hear about his love for her country and his respect for its piety.

The Translation of "Dante."

SIR,—Will you allow me to add a few words to my protest—all too brief, clearly, for comprehension—on Cary's translation? I was not, assuredly, deprecating Cary's verses because they were "old." What could be more exquisite than Chaucer's translation ("Second Nun's Tale") of a part of St. Bernard's prayer to the Virgin (Paradiso, Canto xxxiii.)?

Assembled in thee is magnificence
With mercy, goodnesse, and with swich pitee
That thou, that art the Sonne of excellence,
That only helpeth hem that preyen thee,
But ofte tyme of thy benignitee,
Ful frely, er that men thyn help biseche,
Thou goost biforn, and art hir lyves leche.

Take, again, Chaucer's turning of Nel ventre tuo si raccese l'amore,

Per lo cui caldo, nell' eterna pace,

into

Withiune the cloistre blisful of thy sydes
Took mannes shap the eternal love and pees, and one feels how great our loss is in not having more from the same master.

Nor was I unmindful of Ruskin's criticism, who, indeed, first sent me to Cary; but Ruskin's type of mind is Dantesque and analytic—two qualities which sufficiently explain his only half-concealed dislike for Milton's gorgeous imagery.

Nor do I agree with Mr. Francis Thompson in thinking that the English translators have failed because our poets cannot find an equivalent for Dante's "ternaries." No; is it not a question of vocabulary rather than metre? When one recalls the Bible, the Elizabethan translation, and, say, Morris's Beowulf, do we not feel that "prose" versions may be as impassioned and poetic as any metrical rendering, however imitative the music may be of the original? Mr. Francis Thompson's analysis of what English blank verse can do is admirable; but is he not thinking merely of Milton's and Shakespeare's use of it? But do they exhaust its resources? And now let me conclude with one more question: Is it not strange, after all, that no one has given us a paraphrase of Dante which can take rank with the many other paraphrases in which our language is peculiarly rich?—I am, &c.,

The Manifold Sins of the Adverb.

SIR,—I have noticed of late in certain literary journals a very proper attack upon the objectionable habit of using the split infinitive. For my part, words fail to adequately describe my contempt for all who indulge in the pernicious practice. The great objection to the custom is, of course, that the guilty adverb intervenes clumsily and obstructs the sense, so that the confused reader fails to get that clear grasp of the writer's thought which he would have obtained if the words had flowed in proper sequence.

But we should be logical, and go further in the matter. Is it not, for the same reason, just as objectionable to interpose the adverb or adverbial clause between the auxiliary and the verb? For example, "I will, in case of accidents, go." You will frequently come across instances of this.

The intrusive part of speech is also to be found between the noun and the verb, confusing the sense and abusing its privileges. Think of "He without mercy struck"! An adverb undoubtedly should "know its place," which is, of course, immediately after the verb. At other times this very loose particle strays beyond the object of a sentence in a most disorderly way: "They parted at the gate for ever." You will also find the adverbial clause playing this trick again and again.

Sometimes the adverb begins the sentence, and starts "qualifying the verb" before the verb itself can be guessed at—e.g., "In the evening I may wish to go to the theatre." Observe the ambiguity of meaning which results. Occasionally I have known good writers give way thus.

We have discouraged the verb from allowing its auxiliaries to go loose; and the preposition at the tail of a sentence we have also done away with; and if we can only pin that wretched piece of grammatical quicksilver to the rear of the verb we shall begin to get English composition into something like order.

I hope we shall see in future that every sentence is kept neat; and not allow the confusing, disorderly liberty of style which so has disgraced, sadly till now the dignity of our language.—I am, &c.,

SIMPLICITY SEVERE.

Misconceptions.

SIR,—May I add one more example to the astonishing list of childish misconceptions? It was in the days when the Litany formed an inevitable part of the Morning Service, and a little boy of my acquaintance, unable to read, used to hear, in response to an unintelligible drone from the officiating clergyman, the oft-repeated and awe-inspiring statement, "We see—such a hairus—good Lord!" Many a scared glance did he cast about the little country church, wondering what a "hairus" might be, and why he could not also see one. The sentence was, of course, the Buckinghamshire rendering of "We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord."—I am, &c.,

STELLA M. DÜRING.

SIR,—Your contributor to the issue of September 23, on "The Ineligible of the Elegy," mentioned the case of a youth who was puzzled by Gray's line:

The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear.

That hard-worked word "bear," contrary to its astronomical associations, seems to be given to misleading the young. Witness the following story told me at first hand:

A child, being asked to draw a picture illustrating her favourite hymn, exhibited a picture of a fashionable lady ministering to a rather shaggy animal. Being asked to explain by her teacher, she quoted the lines:

Can a woman's tender care
Cease toward the child she-bear?

SIR,—Eight pupils, whose average age might be seven, were asked to write the Lord's Prayer from memory. Five of the eight wrote: "Lead us not in tutem tation"

A friend took her Sunday-school class to the seaside. It was a new experience for one scholar, who exclaimed: "Teacher, there's the sea, but where's all the tinimies?" ("The sea, and all that in them is").—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 2.

WE asked last week for mottoes suitable to stand on the title-page of a history of the Dreyfus case. A great many suggestions have reached us, the majority of them so apt that the task of fixing upon the best has been no light one. We have decided, however, that the quotation from Carlyle's Past and Present, sent in by Mr. Ernest Davies, 3, Phené Street, Chelsea, has more to commend it than any other, and to Mr. Davies a cheque has therefore been sent. This is the passage:

"For properly, as many men as there are in a nation who can withal see Heaven's invisible justice, and know it to be on earth also omnipotent, so many men are there who stand between a nation and perdition."

Among the best of the remainder are these:

"The stake that is to be secured is of so great an interest, that all our industry, and all the violences we can suffer in the prosecution of it are not inconsiderable. This affair is to be done but once, and then never any more unto eternal ages."—Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Dying." [G. D., Horley.]

"JUDGE: Then did the Judge say to him, Hast thou any more to say?"

ENVY: My lord, I could say much more, only I would not be tedious to the court. Yet, if need be, when the other gentlemen have given in their evidence, rather than anything shall be wanting that will despatch him, I will enlarge my testimony against him. . . .

FAITHFUL: May I speak a few words in my own defence?

JUDGE: Sirrah! sirrah! thou deservest to live no longer, but to be slain immediately upon the place; yet, that all men may see our gentleness towards thee, let us hear what thou, vile runagate, hast to say.—John Bunyan, "The Trial of Faithful."

[J. P., Fenton.]

"All other wrongs done, patiently I take:
But touch my honour and the case is changed!"

—From the Pope's speech in "The Ring and the Book" (R. Browning).

[M. O. E., Forest Hill.]

"Thou shalt not see me blush,
Nor change my countenance for this arrest:
A heart unspotted is not easily daunted.
The purest spring is not so free from mud
As I am clear from treason."

—Shakespeare, "Henry VI., Part II., Act iii., Scene 1."

[E. H., Didsbury.]

"France, thou shalt rue this treason with thy tears."

—Shakespeare, "Henry VI., Part I., Act iii., Scene 2."

[G. R., Aberdeen]

"There is the moral of all human tales:
'Tis but the same rehearsal of the past,
First Freedom, and then Glory—When that fails, Wealth, Vice, Corruption—Barbarism at last.
And History, with all her volumes vast,
Hath but one page."—Byron.

[W. J. F., Birmingham.]

"If aught against my life
Thy country sought of thee, it sought unjustly,
Against the law of nature, law of nations;
No more thy country, but an impious crew
Of men conspiring to uphold their state
By worse than hostile deeds, violating the ends
For which our country is a name so dear."

—Samson Agonistes.

[Mrs. J. S., Glasgow.]

"Where other superstitions flourish, political superstitions take root."—Herbert Spencer.

[H. B., Gartcosh.]

"Your deliverance sleepeth not, He that will come is not slack of His promise. Wait on for God's timeous salvation, ask not when or how long. I hope He shall lose nothing of you in the furnace, but dross. Commit your cause in meekness (forgiving your oppressors) to God, and your sentence shall come back from Him laughing."—From a letter by Rev. Samuel Rutherford to William Glendinning, dated from the prison of Aberdeen, July 6, 1637.

[J. C. H., Chapelhill.]

"As if Justice could be anything but the same ample law, expounded by natural judges and saviours,
As if it might be this thing or that thing, according to decisions."

—Walt Whitman.

[A. M. P., Lincoln.]

"MACDUFF'S SON: What is a traitor?

LADY MACDUFF: Why, one that swears and lies.

SON: There are liars and swearers enough to beat the honest men, and hang them up."—"Macbeth," Act iv., Scene 2.

[L. K., Tunbridge Wells.]

"The compensation for injustice is that in that dark ordeal we gather the worthiest around us."—Geo. Meredith, "Richard Feverel."

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, October 10. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 388 or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers.

The Strange Adventures of Israel Pendray.

Illustrated by A. L. RICHARDSON.

The scene of the story is laid in Cornwall amid the early struggles of Methodism against the persecutions to which its adherents were subjected at the time John Wesley began preaching. In the course of the narration many thrilling incidents and legendary stories of the Cornish smugglers and wreckers are vividly portrayed.

Ready Shortly. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

A Lost Identity.

By J. D. HENNESEY.

A remarkable and weird story. Mr. Hennesey deals with the strange case of Mark Gunnery, who by the sinister occult influence of his enemy has his spirit separated from his soul and body and enshrined in that of an aged man.
The narrative is largely concerned with the doings of the dual Mark; and the reader's attention is held from first to last.

"Max O'Rell's book will be read here with great interest. Always brilliant, as a satirist and an observer, and rightly appreciated it ought to benefit those whom it most severely lashes."—Daily Telegraph.

The Art of Thinking.

By T. SHARPER KNOWLSON.

EXTRACT FROM THE PREFACE:—"A short time ago one of our most distinguished statesmen, in giving an address on education, said: 'What you want to develop in your race is the art of thinking, and thinking is an art which stands a very good chance of perishing from amongst us altogether.
The risks, to which independent thinking is exposed when you come to reckon them up are manifold and dangerous. I think the Press, with all its merits, is one of the greatest enemies of independent thinking.'.....People read a great deal more than they used to do—there is more to read—but they think less."

that they have secured the copyright of BLANCHE WILLIS HOWARD'S last work, to be issued October 7; entitled

Vroni: The Weaver's Heart's Dearest.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 6s.

The sudden and early death of the Author of "Guenn" came as a shock to the Literary World in the autumn of last year, and in speaking of this sad event Literature says:—"In 'Guenn' Miss Howard revealed a spirit, a breath, of true romance, akin to, if not actually, genius. To this day it remains not only a steadfastly popular novel, but par excellence the finest romance of Breton life and scenery by any English writing novelist."

Now Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 6s.

The Red Rag of Ritual.

By GEORGE CUSACK.

The burning question of the day for all church-goers is without doubt "Ritual," which, as the hydra-headed monster Hercules was called to combat, occurs and re-occurs with a persistency not to be gainsaid. That there is a right and wrong on both sides no unbiased person will deny, and "The Red Rag of Ritual" throws a clear impartial light on the subject, the whole being woven together in the shape of a clever, well-written novel.

NEW VOLUME BY CHRISTIAN LYS.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 6s.

The Fortress of Yadasara.

By CHRISTIAN LYS.

With 8 Illustrations by LANCELOT SPEED.

The Scotsman of June 20 says:—"The story is cleverly written, and the action moves freely and rapidly. There is plenty of excitement and adventure, and the marvellous element has the effect of humour, by reason of the genial way in which the reader's incredulity is taken for granted and disregarded."

THE LIBRARY OF NATURAL HISTORY ROMANCE.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 6s. per volume.

VOLUME I.

The Romance of Wild Flowers.

A Companion to the British Flora.

By EDWARD STEP, F.L.S.

With upwards of 200 Original Illustrations.

The Sunday Times says:—"The holiday-maker, with a taste for flowers, will find Mr. Step's romance of the actual more permanently fascinating than any work of mere fiction. The author knows well how to impart his stores of botanical knowledge in an easy, bright, and informing fashion. The book is likely long to remain a standard work in popular and yet really scientific botany."

Mr. Trevor-Battye's simple and unaffected narrative enables us to learn a good deal."—Times.

"A well-told record of a very original bit of exploration, with many valuable natural history facts, and a life-like description of the hitherto neglected nomad race of the Samoyeds. The plentiful illustrations, by the author himself, Mr. J. T. Nettlehip, and Mr. Charles Whympers, add much to the charm of the book."—Daily Telegraph.

Picturesque Australasia: A Delineation by Pen and Pencil of the Scenery, the Towns, and the Life of the People throughout the Colonies of Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, and the Adjacent Islands, edited by Edward E. Morris, M.A., assisted by Eminent Writers in the various Colonies, illustrated by 40 Full-Page Engravings and Maps, and upwards of 1,000 Illustrations, 4 vols., 4to, cloth gilt (pub. £1 10s.) ... 10 6

In order that the illustrations should be of the highest quality, Artists were specially commissioned by the Publishers to travel through Australasia to prepare original drawings for the work, and a faithful pictorial record has thus, at great expense, been obtained.

The beauty of the natural scenery depicted, so different in character from that found in our own land; the splendour of towns, which a generation ago were non-existent; the deeply-interesting glimpses which are presented of life at the gold mines, in the bush, and in the interior; the charming coast and river scenery: all these make up a pictorial panorama so novel and fresh as to come as a surprise to the reader.

SOME FORTHCOMING FICTION ANNOUNCED BY JARROLD & SONS.

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS.

By DR. MAURUS JOKAI.

"The greatest living master of romantic fiction." St. James's Gazette.

THE POOR PLUTOCRATS.

By MAURUS JOKAI. Translated by R. NISBET BAIN. With Photogravure.

"The Poor Plutochrats" is one of its author's best-known works in his own country, while well-reputed Danish, Dutch, Polish, and German translations testify to its popularity on the Continent. It is essentially a tale of incident and adventure, but its characterisation is unquestionably its strongest point, and among its characters are some of the most finished and original portraits that the great Hungarian has given us, while throughout the vivid descriptions of mountain scenery are in the author's most characteristic vein.

A FAMOUS ROMANCE ON THE LIFE OF MOZART.

THE TONE KING.

A Romance of the Life of Mozart.

By HERIBERT RAOH. Translated by J. E. ST. QUENTIN RAE. With fine Photogravure after Jäger's portrait of Mozart.

"The Tone King" tells with charming sympathy the life story of Mozart, and, together with the same author's romances on the lives of Beethoven and Weber, has almost attained the position of a classic. The three romances were recently referred to in the German Publishers' Circular as "forming together a complete cycle of incomparable pictures of the life and works of musical amateurs, the book is notable for its descriptions of Continental scenery and the pretty pictures of eighteenth-century social life."

CYRANO DE BERGERAC. CAPTAIN SATAN.

Adventures of Cyrano de Bergerac.

By LOUIS GAILLET.

Captain Satan forms a romance d'adventure of a most exciting character, with the renowned Cyrano de Bergerac and his "heroic" nose for Nero. Throughout the work we are brought closely in contact with Cyrano, and a vivid picture of the famous swashbuckler-poet is given. Apart, however, from this special interest, the book may well rely on its intrinsic merits, and the stirring and breathless incidents which rapidly succeed one another maintain the reader's interest at a high pitch of excitement.

BY A NEW POLISH WRITER. ANIMA VILIS.

A Tale of the Great Siberian Steppe.

By MARIA RODZIEWICZ. Translated by Count E. C. DE SOISSONS.

"Anima Vilis," in addition to its powerful characterisation, purports to give a faithful presentation of Siberia and its life, and depicts a mode of existence which is very different from the previous erroneous impressions of Siberia.

MR. FRED. WHISHAW'S NEW BOOK. CALLED BACK to TSARLAND. The Story of a Perilous Quest in Russia.

CURTIS YORKE'S LATEST NOVEL. JOCELYN ERROL.

LESLIE KEITH'S NEW NOVEL. WAYFARERS ALL.

OR, THE WITNESS OF THE MONUMENTS.

By Rev. C. J. BALL, M.A.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF BIBLICAL ARCHÆOLOGY.

CONTAINS OVER 330 ILLUSTRATIONS (30 PLATES COLOURED).

Professor SAYCE, LL.D., writes:—

"This is a book which ought to be in the hands not only of every Oriental archaeologist, but of every student of the Old Testament Scriptures as well. Nothing like it has ever been published. All the appliances of modern science have been used to make the accurate and beautifully executed illustrations as perfect as possible, though the volume in which they are contained is a marvel of cheapness. It is not so long ago since such a work, with its sumptuous print and paper, would have cost not fifteen shillings, but fifteen pounds."

"A museum in petto."
"As complete a collection as could have been got together."
Athenæum.

"The dreams of a poet... of a poet who loves the twilight better than sunshine, and dim cloud forms better than the loveliest ever chiselled out of marble, or moulded in flesh; what he sings of is the sense of mystery in things that haunts and overpowers the mind to the exclusion of more human feelings.....It has the most beautiful cover that we have ever seen on any modern book."—Spectator.

"Mr. Yeats is the only one among the younger English poets who has the whole poetical temperament and nothing but the poetical temperament.....
Technically, the verse is far in advance of anything he has ever done.....It is only gradually that Mr.
Yeats has learnt to become quite human. Life is the last thing he has learnt, and it is life, an extraordinarily intense inner life, that I find in this book of lyrics, which may seem also to be one long 'hymn to intellectual beauty.'—Saturday Review.

"The theme throughout the whole book is the same —an answer to the 'sweet everlasting voices,' the response of the passion of the heart to what is beyond plishment set in his booklet 'Admirals All'? There had not been wanting critics to predict that Mr. Newbolt, like the Admirals of his song, had 'said his say,' and that nothing more could be expected of him...

'The Island Race,' let us say at once, puts the croakers to shame. It contains nothing better than the best things in 'Admirals All,' for the excellent reason that these things were perfect in their kind and could not be bettered.....Scarcely a poem of the whole forty is without its note of metrical charm, its memorable line or stanza."—Daily Chronicle.

"If this new volume does no more than establish the reputation won by 'Admirals All,' it is still an achievement.....In 'The Death of Admiral Blake' there is real pathos and dignity. The same haunting charm is found, with quite another measure in the dirge music of 'Messmates.'—Athenæum.

The arrangement of most books which treat of French prosody suggests that they are designed to teach the art of writing verse. The object of this Primer is less ambitious, being to associate with interesting extracts from the work of numerous French poets such hints as to the structure of French verse as may tend to secure correct and intelligent reading of these extracts themselves and adequate appreciation of the distinctive qualities of French poetry as therein represented.

The Literary Week.

MR. LECKY'S new book, to be published by Messrs. Longmans next week, is called The Map of Life: Conduct and Character, and therein an attempt is made to answer most of the ethical questions which beset the conscientious citizen of the world. Mr. Lecky takes as his motto the well-known saying of Tocqueville: "La vie n'est pas un plaisir ni une douleur, mais une affaire grave dont nous sommes chargés, et qu'il faut conduire et terminer à notre honneur." On looking through the synopsis of contents we note several subjects on which Mr. Lecky's opinion will be peculiarly interesting at this moment. Among these are the Jameson Raid, modern Ritualism, and moral compromise in war.

LAST week Mr. Kipling rhymed in the Times on the Transvaal crisis, and this week Mr. Swinburne has contributed to the same paper his word on the situation, in the form of a rather difficult sonnet with no break between octave and sestet. Mr. Kipling, it will be remembered, neglected, until the day after, to declare his poem free from copyright in this country, and other editors, bearing in mind, perhaps, the strict views on copyright which the Times has lately shown itself to cherish, neglected even then to take advantage of the offer. Profiting by Mr. Kipling's delay, Mr. Swinburne, on the day of issue, labelled his sonnet not copyright. It was quoted to a small extent; but a sonnet is not, of course, the way to reach the people. The people are reached by ballad or song.

MR. SWINBURNE'S sonnet, indeed, would have been better unprinted. This is not a time for vilifying our enemies in terms of which right-thinking Englishmen must feel ashamed. Moreover, as patriotic verse the thing is nought. Patriotic verse should be straight, virile, and should leap to the understanding. Look at the concluding lines:

Scarce we hear
Foul tongues that blacken God's dishonoured name
With prayers turned curses and with praise found shame Defy the truth whose witness now draws near
To scourge these dogs, agape with jaws afoam,
Down out of life. Strike, England, and strike home.

We ask, are the Boers dogs? Are their jaws agape with foam? Are they not rather resolute men who have set their teeth to defend their country—though mistaken, if you like? Mr. Swinburne's sonnet is not patriotic poetry; it is not poetry of any kind; it is hysteria.

MR. ALFRED AUSTIN has, so far, written no special poem to hit the moment, although his views concerning English attempts against Boer oppression are well known. He has, however, presented fifty copies of his Songs of England for distribution on transports conveying our men to Africa.

MR. W. H. MALLOCK has transliterated the Wisdom of Lucretius into a poem in the measure of FitzGerald's Omar

Khayyám. The poem will appear in the December number of Lady Randolph Churchill's Review. Subsequently, with a prefatory essay and a literal translation of the passages transformed in the verses, it will be published in a volume.

WE understand that the paper on London in Blackwood's Magazine, which has attracted some attention, was from Mr. G. S. Street's pen.

MRS. TYNDALL'S biography of John Tyndall has again been thrown back, and it is now impossible to assign any definite time for its appearance. It would have been particularly interesting to have been able to read the work side by side with the Life of Huxley, which is to be ready in a few days.

THE false rumour that Mr. Rider Haggard has gone to British Columbia to take up some mines there has given the ingenious journalist an excellent opening for embroidery. As we stated last week, the real traveller is another Mr. Haggard altogether. None the less we find the following in an American paper just to hand:

H. RIDER HAGGARD IN CANADA.

THE FAMOUS NOVELIST TRAVELLING INCOGNITO.

Author of King Solomon's Mines has mining interests in the Canadian Northwest that are not myths—Gathering material for a mining camp story.

Vancouver, B.C., Sept. 22.—Mr. H. Rider Haggard, author of King Solomon's Mines and other works of fiction, has been in this city for over a week, and is now at Skagway with Lord Hamilton. The famous English writer is travelling incognito, and while here succeeded in keeping his identity from becoming generally known. . . The author of She has never been in the Canadian north before, and he may while there gather material for a work which will embody his experiences in the mining camps of British Columbia.

It will be interesting to learn how long it will be before this myth is entirely dissipated.

WE are requested to state that the forecast of Mr. Stephen Phillips's Paolo and Francesca which appeared in the Daily Mail of Wednesday was unauthorised. The quotations, which had been taken from an early draft of the tragedy, are no longer representative, and the plot was incorrectly given.

THE negotiations which have been long pending for the purchase of the St. James's Gazette are now concluded, and the paper has passed from the possession of Mr. Steinkopff into that of a syndicate. Mr. Hugh Chisholm remains in the editorial chair. The St. James's Budget is also to be revived, but not again as an illustrated weekly. The old battle of the Budgets has indeed ceased. A few years ago there were the Pall Mall Budget, the St. James's Budget, and the Westminster Budget, all vying with each to give the best sixpennyworth of picture and article. And now the Pall Mall Budget is no more, the Westminster is again at threepence, and the St. James's is to be once again without illustrations. Its old editor, Mr. Penderel Brodhurst, returns to his post.

THE latest of the pocket editions to reach us is, in one way at least, the most striking and satisfactory of them all. Its name is the "New Century Library," its publishers Messrs. Nelson & Sons, and the first volume is The Post-humous Papers of the Pickwick Club, complete. It is in that word "complete" that the special merit of Messrs. Nelson's edition resides. Hitherto Pickwick has had to be split up into two or three volumes, a division which has to a large extent neutralised the advantages of compactness which a pocket edition should possess. But Messrs. Nelson, by using India paper, have been enabled to present a complete Pickwick of 845 pages, printed in a large type, in a volume half an inch thick, 4½ by 6 inches in superficies, and weighing only four ounces. All pedestrians and travellers who like to have a book about them should be grateful to the makers of India paper. The "New Century" books are to be published month by month, after Dickens coming Scott and Thackeray.

APPROPOS of pocket editions, we may mention that Messrs. Dent's "Temple" edition of Scott, in forty-eight volumes, is now complete, and their "Temple" Dickens, running to thirty-two volumes, has been carried as far as it can be until the copyrights of the remaining books are exhausted.

LAST Saturday's Daily News contained a very interesting character-sketch of John Rylands, the millionaire whose wealth has put Manchester into the possession of the Althorp Library, from the pen of Dr. Parker, who knew him well. We quote two passages:

The simplicity of his life had its occasional drawbacks, not, indeed, very serious, yet not without comical significance. I well remember two public men dining with him, and, although they were preachers, they really did know the difference between real champagne and even the best sorts of nettle beer. As they were both eminent ministers, I will not credit them with a finer discrimination; it is enough that, to my certain knowledge, their palates were not absolutely paralysed. Would they take sherry? Yes. Each took a critical sip, and looked at the other. To me, as a young teetotaler, the look had some kind of occult meaning which a raw countryman could not be expected to discern. Would they take claret? Yes. One mouthful was enough. Would they taste the Madeira? Thanks. No. They were not dyspeptic; they were only sensible and discerning. All wines were alike to the hospitable but abstemious host. So were all tobaccos, for he probably hardly knew the difference between golden shag and black twist. Had it been otherwise, the John Rylands Library might never have been heard of. The world owes nothing to gluttons and wine-bibbers. The two critical guests have left nothing behind them; John Rylands has left a library worthy of his city and the nation.

MR. RYLANDS's own literary tastes were hardly in accord with the purchase of the Spencer books. Says Dr. Parker:

I remember Mr. Rylands telling me that he had collected twenty thousand metrical pieces. The blank books into which the hymns were pasted became quite a considerable library. Each series was in order, reference being simplified by copious indices. The other issue was still more remarkable. On one occasion Mr. Rylands said to me: "Just as I can tell almost by a glance at my book how many pieces of cloth, and how many yards of ribbon, are in my warehouse, so I want to be able to show in the easiest possible way exactly and completely what the Bible says upon any of its own subjects." This idea he carried out at great expense. His plan was to take the Authorised Version just as it stands, and number its paragraphs from one up to hundreds. The numbers were in large type. The margin of the Bible was very wide, and the numbers were set boldly upon it. To accompany the Bible Mr. Rylands published a book of subjects, such as Atonement, Baptism, Consecration, Festivals, Sacrifices, and the like, and under each of these subjects were printed all the numbers of paragraphs referring to it. So by keeping the Bible and the key side by side the reader could at once see everything in the Bible upon any particular subject. This was a new form of a concordance of subjects in contradistinction to a concordance of words.

It is a far cry from this ingenious hobby to the "Mazarin Bible" of 1540-55—one of the chief Althorp treasures, now Manchester's—to the "Pfister Bible," to the "Mentz Bible" of 1462, and all the other priceless specimens which John Rylands's wealth has given to his city.

WE have received from Mr. J. Rochelle Thomas, the antiquarian, a circular relating to two oak chests which he has recently acquired, and for which, under the belief that they were Shakespeare's, he is asking £400. They were bought, it seems, at the sale of the contents of Shakespeare's house at Stratford-on-Avon, in 1847, by the late Charles Shrewsbury Butler, M.P., and have now passed into Mr. Thomas's hands. The reproduction in this circular of the title-page of the 1847 catalogue was a pleasant thought. The sale was conducted by the great George Robins, for whom, as many good stories go to prove, nothing but superlatives existed. If a house had a decent garden, it straightway "positively, gentlemen, reeks of roses"; if the song of birds were heard thereabouts, "I can assure you, gentlemen, that you can hardly sleep for nightingales." The present catalogue describes Shakespeare's house as "the truly heart-stirring relic of a most glorious period, and of England's immortal bard" and "the most honoured monument of the greatest genius that ever lived." This is not Robins at his best, but it will serve.

"A RIVAL M.P." has taken in hand one of the poems on "Winter" submitted to us for competition a week or so ago, and has treated it by a process which may be called improvement by elision. This is the poem, the suggested omissions being enclosed between square brackets, and such new words as the omissions make necessary being given in italics:

WINTER.

Some folks may sigh for summer days,
To [laze and] dream among the flowers;
Give me old winter's breezy ways,
The north wind's [sparkling] frosty hours.
To feel the warm, enkindled blood
Run [circling] to my glad heart's core,
To say with Schiller "Oh, 'tis good
To [be a]live," and wish no more.
To glide along the crispy ice
With newly sharpened, [well-cut] skates;
Each day to find a new device
For threes and dainty [figure] eights.
And thro' the woody copse to wend,
[Our way] Hand joined in hand, some night
When winter stars to Love's eyes lend
A newer [note, a] gladder light.
Within the fireside's ingle nook,
As [So still and] quiet as a mouse,
She knitting, I with pipe and book—
The [My favourite,] Angel in the House.
Warmed by the yule-log's cheerful light,
Her words [of love] will seem more tender,
What memories we'll weave at night!—
Four feet upon a [brass-bound] fender.

It does not necessarily follow that a poem is better because its metre is rendered more brisk. One metre suits one subject, one another. But we do not think that in the present instance any harm has been done by the emendations. In his Letters to Fanny Kemble, it may be remembered, FitzGerald shows how injurious to a poem of Burns similar treatment can be. If any reader can suggest a well-known poem which would benefit by a similar process of elision we should be interested.

THE Boys' Own Paper—or the B.O.P., as it is affectionately called—has seen many rivals start up since it was first issued, twenty-one years ago; but it has beaten them all. And it is now as strong and popular as ever, and still under the same editor, Mr. G. A. Hutchinson, who prepared the first number. As some celebration of the B.O.P.'s majority, a dinner has been arranged at the Holborn Restaurant for Tuesday, October 31, when past and present contributors, literary and artistic, will be present, as well as a number of "Old Boys." The price of the tickets has been limited to 5s., and to ensure seats early application should be made to the Hon. Sec. of the Dinner Committee, Mr. W. J. Gordon, Hillside, Thurleigh-road, Balham, S.W.

JEALOUS rivals of Mr. Guy Boothby who have hitherto been unable to see what there is "in him," will find his gifts codified carefully in the current Blackwood. Under the title "Fashion in Fiction," an anonymous critic inquires into the success of Mr. Boothby, Mr. Sheldon, and Mr. Silas K. Hocking. The writer suggests that their extraordinary vogue is not due to especial merit, but to their recognition that, whereas other fashions in fiction are continually changing, "three have kept a permanent hold upon the world's attention. Detectives, mysticism, and theology seem never to pall." Mr. Boothby adheres to detectives and mysticism; Mr. Sheldon and Mr. Hocking go in for theology. The result of this article will not, we trust, mean that some of the other leaders of fashion in fiction will go in for theology too. More tolerable far are detectives and mysticism.

APPROPOS of the sedulous supply of the public with exactly what the public wants, there is a guileless letter in the current Author which should kindle envy in many a budding novelist. It runs thus:

Does it occur to some of the failures who write to you that some men make a tolerable income out of fiction alone? Personally, I started as a journalist and proved myself eminently incompetent. At the present moment if I do write an article I do it badly, and at the cost of prodigious labour. But fiction comes more easily to me, and in financial return has already brought me £4,000 during this current year. I do not live in London, neither do I log-roll. I am not conscious of knowing a single human being who writes reviews. But I take note of what the public wants, and I supply it to the best of my ability. In one point I quite agree with your former correspondents, I never consider that I am adequately remunerated. I should much prefer £8,000 or £16,000. In fact, I could enjoy £32,000. But in the meanwhile £4,000 does not seem bad earning (for three-quarters of a year) for a man who much prefers (and employs) enjoyment to labour.

YACHTSMAN.

This is truly the golden age for mediocre narrators.

MR. DOOLEY, in the Westminster Gazette, on the Bertillon system of identifying criminals, is immense: "Ye know Bertillon. . . . He's th' la-ad that invinted th' system iv detictive wurruk med aisy that they use down in the Cinthral polis-station. I mind wanst afther 'twas inthrojooed th' loot says to Andy Rahan—he's a sergeant now, be hivins—he says, 'Go out,' he says, 'an' fetch in Mike McGool, th' safe robber,' he says. 'Here's his description,' he says. 'Eyelashes, eight killomethres long; eyes, blue an' assymethrical; jaw, bituminous; measurement, fr'm abaft th' left ear to base iv maxillary glan's, four hectograms; a r-red scar runnin' fr'm th' noomogasthric narve to th' sicond dorsal verteebree,' he says. 'Tis so; I have th' description at home in th' cash drawer.' 'I don't know anything about his noomogasthric narves,' he says, 'but I reco'nized his face,' he says. 'I've r-run him in fifty times,' he says."

MAURUS JOKAI, the Hungarian patriot, and the author of almost countless vigorous and absorbing romances, has been taking the readers of the Magyar journal Nemzet into his confidence, much as certain men of note in this country have been confiding their histories to Mr. T. P. O'Connor. "Every good man," says Jokai (we quote from the translation made by the Morning Post's Vienna correspondent), "is attended by two guardian angels—the good angel and the angel of wickedness. The bad angel always gives him sound, profitable, worldly-wise advice; the good angel urges him on to deeds of Quixotic folly. There is a date—March 15, 1848—of vast importance in Hungarian history. On the eve of this day I, with a whole company of enthusiastic spirits, swore to take my part in an effort for freedom for the liberation of Hungary from the heavy yoke of Austria. My bad angel told me that I was a fool, a visionary, a madman, and urged me to take to my heels while there was yet time. My good angel, on the contrary, reminded me that I had pledged my word of honour, and that I was engaged in a good cause. If my bad angel had prevailed I might possibly have in after years attained the dizzy eminence of the Burgomastership of some obscure provincial town, but I should not have become the author of a hundred books, while Hungary would not regard that day as one of the most glorious in her annals if prudence had outweighed goodness."

JOKAI, who has recently taken a young wife, then describes the happiness of his first marriage, although there again he had been urged on by the angel of Quixotic folly and dissuaded by her worldly-wise sister. The sum of it therefore is: "Be good men and true, rather than prudent or worldly-wise."

"Is it 'Gilian the Dreamer' or Neil the Dreamer?" is the question which some readers of Mr. Neil Munro's new story have been asking. As a matter of fact, we believe, Gilian is the only fictional character in Mr. Munro's book. All the others had their counterparts in real life, and their descendants are still to the fore once deeply interested in the tale that so intimately concerns them. Of course, in Gilian's there must be much of Mr. Munro's own early imaginings, but the author's career has shown that he can grasp the substance without bothering overmuch about the dream. The work on which Mr. Munro is at present engaged is in a more romantic style than anything he has done.

FABULISTS are many, but only the few are chosen. Mr. Crossland's Literary Parables set many minds at work on this piquant form of literature, but we have not been able to print their efforts. The fable which follows, by Mr. Gautier de Nogent, is more to the point:

A COMPLAINT.

There was once a young nobleman who wished to write a great work, so, after considering for many nights, he said to a Sage: "Give me a subject whereon to write, for I would be a great author."

"Go into the world as a poor man, and learn," said the Sage.

After a year the young man returned, saying: "I have written many chapters, but no one will publish them."

Then the Sage replied: "Go to the publisher as a rich man."

Many moons went by before the young man came again.

"The book is printed and published, but no one will read it," he complained.

"Even so," quoth the Sage; "I can do no more."

"THE latest advance puff," writes a correspondent, "needs the author of The Book of Snobs to deal adequately with it. 'Mr. Anthony Hope,' it runs, in the Bookman, 'is speaking with warm praise of the young Duchess of Sutherland's new novel. She calls it One Hour and the Next. It is a story concerning itself with the East End, and particularly with labour agitations.' This is very ingenious. Success and rank, the two gods of the ordinary person, join hands, and when the time comes the publisher will reap his harvest. Mr. Hall Caine, I expect soon to read, has great hopes of the new series of Leaves from a Journal in the Highlands which Her Majesty is thinking of issuing."

In a recent number we printed an adaptation by Mr. Paul Swinburne of Regnier's epitaph. A correspondent, Mr. R. Beverley, offers this alternative version:

I've lived without a single thought,
Obeying simply as I ought,
Sweet Nature's law or whim;
And so I much astonished be
That Death has dared to think of me,
Who never thought of him.

"I apologise to Regnier and yourself," adds Mr. Beverley, "for the introduction of 'whim.' Perhaps you will pardon: I am sure Regnier would." We cannot be behind Regnier in magnanimity; we pardon too.

UNDER the title "Popular Studies in Mythology, Romance, and Folklore" Mr. Nutt is issuing a series of handy little sixpenny pamphlets which those schoolmasters who care to touch on these subjects should find of the greatest use. An introduction to Celtic and Mediæval Romance, by Mr. Alfred Nutt, comes first, and then "Folklore: What is It and What is the Good of It?" by Mr. E. S. Hartland, the President of the Folklore Society. Among the other numbers arranged for are: "The Fables of Æsop," by Mr. Joseph Jacobs; "Ossian, and the Literature Connected with his Name," by Mr. Alfred Nutt; "A Survey of Arthurian Romance," by Miss Jessie L. Weston; "The Fairy Mythology of Shakespeare"; "Cuchulinn, the Irish Achilles"; "The Troubadours and Their Times"; and "Wagner and Northern Mythology."

Bibliographical.

THE largely increased interest taken in the stage to-day is illustrated by the announcement of a book on Barry Sullivan and his contemporaries. This is hero-worship indeed. That Sir Henry Irving should be about to find in Mr. Hiatt yet another biographer is intelligible enough, for he is the legitimate successor of Macready and Charles Kean. But—Barry Sullivan! That respectable old-school actor is inferior even to Charles Calvert (who has never yet been "biographed") in interest for students of the stage. He "created" very few notable parts (among them, however, being Valence in "Colombe's Birthday"), and he did nothing whatever for the illustration of Shakespeare, though it was as an expositor of Shakespeare that he was best known. He was essentially a player of the second—of even the third—class; and, without prejudging the forthcoming work, I venture to think that all the biography of Sullivan that is needed was supplied half a dozen years ago, when Mr. W. J. Lawrence published a little memoir which ran only to a hundred pages.

During the present season we seem likely to have at least as much autobiography as biography. The reminiscences of Sir Algernon West, Dean Merivale, and Sir Edward Russell have long been promised. Now come announcements of the autobiographies of Mr. Robert Buchanan and Mr. Kegan Paul. I find that the younger literary men do not quite realise that Mr. Buchanan is (as things go nowadays) a veteran. He is in his fifty-ninth year. His first book (it was of verse) was published more than thirty years ago, his first novel about twenty-five years ago. Then came a period during which he sought fame and fortune as a playwright. Of Mr. Buchanan's journalistic experiences not much is known, or, if known, recollected. How many remember the weekly paper called Light, in which he wielded for a time the editorial thunder-bolt?

We all expect a good deal from the Memories of Mr. Kegan Paul, one of whose distinctions is that he is not in the current edition of Who's Who. The man-in-the-street knows of Mr. Paul only as a publisher of books. The reading world has not yet forgotten that Mr. Paul has written books as well as published them—e.g., his Biographical Sketches, dating back some fifteen or sixteen years; his Faith and Unfaith (and other Essays), now more than eight years old; his Confessio Viatoris, now nearly eight years old; and his little brochure on Miracle, published in 1892. He has also translated Huysmans, and this year he gave us a volume of poems. Sir Edward Russell, whose That Reminds Me should soon be in our hands, has not touched literature at many points. He has been an editor in the first place, a dramatic critic in the second; and it is in the latter capacity that he has figured as an author. Did he not write and issue a Study of Hamlet, inspired by Sir Henry Irving's royal Dane? Assuredly he was part author of a little book on Ibsen on His Merits, and also author of a lecture on Ibsen, published some four or five years since.

There is no end to the ingenuity of the anthologists. The very latest instance of it is the promise of a volume of Prayers from the Poets. I suppose there is nothing you cannot pick out of the corpus poetarum if you do but look for it long enough. It was only the other day that someone compiled a little collection of prayers from the works of men of letters. But I fancy (I may be wrong) that these were all in prose. Who was it said, "I never pray, but I have aspirations all day long"? There are more aspirations than set prayers, I suspect, in the world of the belles lettres.

Very welcome will be The Backwater of Life, and Other Essays, by the late James Payn. One wishes that that gentle humorist had written more in this literary form than he did. One recalls with pleasure, not only his two books of recollections, but his Private Views and his Holiday Tasks, published respectively in the early and the late eighties. No doubt he gave up to his weekly notes in the Illustrated London News much which would have had permanent life and value had it been set forth in the essay form.

Certain of Dr. John Brown's essays and sketches are to be issued, I see, at sixpence apiece, which is all very well; but there are many, I believe, who would like to have the opportunity of buying all Dr. Brown's works, in volume form, at a reasonable price. Now, I believe the Hora Subseciva are to be acquired only in three volumes and at half a guinea (less discount). Could not something cheaper be tried?

Great wits jump. No sooner do we grasp the fact that Mrs. Hugh Bell is going to give us a book (formerly a pamphlet) on Conversational Openings than we are told to expect from another lady, not so well known in the world of authorship, a booklet on The Gentle Art of Good Talking. The latter will cost but one shilling—a small price for instruction in an admittedly useful art.

Mr. Kipling as Recruiting Sergeant.

Stalky & Co. By Rudyard Kipling. (Macmillan & Co. 6s.)

WHETHER or not Mr. Kipling claims to have set before us the whole boy, or only a special acquaintance of his own, we do not know; but if Stalky & Co., as we half suspect, purports to tell the truth where Eric, Dean Farrar's famous story (and Mr. Kipling's bugbear), only romances, we must say at once that it comes short of that ambition. The impression of boy life conveyed by Eric is not more false than that given by Stalky & Co., but the two pictures are the poles asunder. Dean Farrar's weakness for sentiment is quite equalled by Mr. Kipling's infatuation for might. One is as wrong as the other. The real boy comes somewhere between the two; you will find more of him in Tom Brown and Tom Sawyer than anywhere else. Mr. Kipling for once is caught tripping. In his endeavour to recapture his youth he has remembered everything but youth's immaturity. The escapades of youth are here, the joy of living, the high spirits; but a cleverness beyond all credence has been superimposed. The attempt to make forcible dialogue and successful strategy has been too much for the author, and fidelity to the fact has gone overboard in the interests of the yarn. We cannot believe that even at Westward Ho! Mr. Kipling's own school, three boys ever existed with so complete a theory of life, such rapid and accurate powers of deduction, such uncanny sagacity, such unwavering disregard of the feelings of others, and such brutal and unflagging wit, as Stalky, M'Turk, and Beetle. Mr. Kipling is entitled to idealise his puppets if he likes, and yet we have for so long come to look to him for genuine efforts to depict people as they are that it is with difficulty that the mind is adjusted to this new phase. We shall express the matter more clearly, perhaps, by saying that in these narratives of the adventures of three boys for the discomfort of masters or other enemies, and the glorification of themselves, the thought, the arrangement, and the orderly accomplishment are adult, the conditions and language—and that only approximately—alone being boyish. Now although the child is the father of the man, and all the rest of it, there is yet a vast difference between a boy's ways and a man's ways. Mr. Kipling seems to us to have overlooked that difference altogether.

He has also so overdone the book that it has to be pronounced his least satisfactory work. There is a piling on of youthful brutality beyond all need, a lack of selective skill. Had Stalky & Co. been a whole-hearted attempt at realism, a genuine effort to portray the boy, we should make no such objections. But it is nothing of the kind: the whole boy, indeed, would no more bear setting down in black and white than the whole man. Realism being, then, out of the question, it remains that Mr. Kipling might have made a far better book. For the moment his instinct for the best stories has left him: he has let in a very flood of the second best. "In Ambush" and "A Little Prep.," the best things here (as good in their kind as one could wish), make some of their companions appear singularly unnecessary. "An Unsavoury Interlude," "The Impressionists," "The Moral Reformers"—no one of these is worth the amount of spirit and literary power which Mr. Kipling has put into them. "An Unsavoury Interlude" in particular is quite unworthy—a story which relates how the three heroes, having been accused of neglecting to wash themselves, retaliate by hiding a putrid cat in their traducers' house. Boys doubtless do such things, and for an oral yarn the incident would serve; but when a man of genius sits down to elaborate the affair we feel that he is expending himself wantonly. The thing does not matter, is not worth the doing, especially by the same hand that gave us the beautiful gravity of the Jungle Books. However, to balance the less worthy or unworthy chapters there are the two that we have named, which are of the first-class of boisterous school story. These, though often unnecessarily exuberant, justify themselves; and, if we had our way, Mr. Kipling's reputation as a delineator of boy life in a military nursery should rest on them alone. We quote from "In Ambush" the passages describing part of the conversation of the three when confined to their dormitory for a crime they did not commit:

"We've got him—got him on the Caudine Toasting-fork!" said Stalky, after those hints were taken. "King 'll have to prove his charges up to the giddy hilt."

"Too much ticklee, him bust," Beetle quoted from a book of his reading. "Didn't I say he'd go pop if we let un bide?"

"No prep., either, O ye incipient drunkards," said M'Turk, "and it's trig night too. Hullo! Here's our dear friend Foxy. More tortures, Foxibus?"

"I've brought you something to eat, young gentlemen," said the Sergeant from behind a crowded tray. Their wars had ever been waged without malice, and a suspicion floated in Foxy's mind that boys who allowed themselves to be tracked so easily might, perhaps, hold something in reserve. Foxy had served through the Mutiny, when early and accurate information was worth much.

"I—I noticed you 'adn't 'ad anything to eat, an' I spoke to Gumbly, an' he said you wasn't exactly cut off from supplies. So I brought up this. It's your potted 'am tin, ain't it, Mr. Corkran?"

"Why, Foxibus, you're a brick," said Stalky. "I didn't think you had this much—what's the word, Beetle?"

"Bowels," Beetle replied promptly. "Thank you, Sergeant. That's young Carter's potted ham, though."

"There was a C on it. I thought it was Mr. Corkran's. This is a very serious business, young gentlemen. That's what it is. I didn't know, perhaps, but there might be something on your side which you hadn't said to Mr. King or Mr. Prout, maybe."

"There is. Heaps, Foxibus." This from Stalky through a full mouth.

"Then you see, if that was the case, it seemed to me I might represent it, quiet so to say, to the 'Ead when he asks me about it. I've got to take 'im the charges to-night, an'—it looks bad on the face of it."

"Trociuous bad, Foxy. Twenty-seven cuts in the Gym before all the school, and public expulsion. 'Wine is a mocker, strong drink is ragin'," quoth Beetle.

Subsequently they visited the Head:

"Good evening," said he, when the three appeared under escort. "I want your undivided attention for a few minutes. You've known me for five years, and I've known you for—twenty-five. I think we understand one another perfectly. I am now going to pay you a tremendous compliment. (The brown one, please, Sergeant. Thanks. You needn't wait.) I'm going to execute you without rhyme, Beetle, or reason. I know you went to Colonel Dabney's covers because you were invited. I'm not even going to send the Sergeant with a note to ask if your statement is true, because I am convinced that, on this occasion, you have adhered strictly to the truth. I know, too, that you were not drinking. (You can take off that virtuous expression, M'Turk, or I shall begin to fear you don't understand me.) There is not a flaw in any of your characters. And that is why I am going to perpetrate a howling injustice. Your reputations have been injured, haven't they? You have been disgraced before the house, haven't you? You have a peculiarly keen regard for the honour of your house, haven't you? Well, now I am going to lick you."

Six apiece was their portion upon that word.

"And this, I think"—the head replaced the cane, and flung the written charge into the waste-paper basket—"covers the situation. When you find a variation from the normal—this will be useful to you in later life—always meet him in an abnormal way."

We have used the phrase, boy life in a military nursery, because it must be remembered that that is what Mr.

Kipling has set out to paint. Stalky & Co. is the book of empire-makers in the making, a fact which must be kept steadily in mind if one is to come through to the last page without qualms, or, indeed, come through to the last page at all. For empires are not made in accordance with the precepts of the fifth chapter of Matthew, or even of the ordinary citizen of the world, and empire-makers are a kind of boy in whom the softer emotions have no place, and in whom any cultivation of the delicacies is discouraged. The qualities which are most needed on our frontiers are the qualities which Mr. Kipling holds up for admiration. It is not so much Young England that is represented here as Young Fighting England, in whom there cannot be too much of quickness of thought and swiftness of decisive action, and who is successful only in so far as he is also merciless, adamant, and domineering. Courageous, too; although, curiously, Mr. Kipling leaves us to form our own conclusions as to his heroes' personal valour. Their victories are for the most part victories of diplomacy and vicarious blows. Stalky, we know from the last story, became a worthy soldier; but at school the three despised cricket with all their hearts, avoided football except under compulsion, and, so far as their historian informs us, fought no fights. On the other hand they once ill-treated a cow (although Mr. Kipling has not included the account of the incident in this volume), and in the course of curing two bullies of bullying their own experiments in that art reached a point of horrible atrocity. Hence, although for soldiers this is one of the most congenial collections of yarns that they are likely to get for some time, and for Volunteers and the military-minded it is hardly less admirable, for the Czar and for peace-loving and all gentle-souled readers it will be well nigh impossible. Mr. Kipling, as apostle of muscle and aggressive Imperialism, has uttered many battle-cries in his time; but this is his completest incitement to war, his crowning achievement as the supreme Recruiting Sergeant. Particularly so, since Stalky & Co. appeals to the young and plastic mind. Parents must please themselves as to whether they add the book to the holiday library; but we can only say that if it is to be read freely by impressionable boys, the sooner the curtain is rung down on the farce of Christianity the better; for there is hardly a precept of the Sermon on the Mount that is not joyously outraged in its pages.

What the book chiefly needs is some humanising relief. Throughout there is the same unerring metallic smartness, with hardly a hint of deeper feelings; the same torrent of brilliant slang. And this reminds us that besides other reasons for not handing this book to a boy, which will occur to every schoolmaster who happens to read it, there is also the objection that imitators of Stalky, M'Turk, and Beetle would be a very noxious race. For the originals we have admiration, albeit tempered by incredulity; but their derivatives will be appalling.

The Only-Begetter of Impressionism.

Velasquez. By R. A. M. Stevenson. (George Bell & Sons. 5s. net.)

THIS cheap edition of Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson's Velasquez is a valuable little work. Mr. Stevenson is known as an admirable art critic. His technical knowledge is thorough, and his appreciation cultivated. He expresses himself in sound, literary English, without unnecessary ostentation of the terms of the schools. Yet he is far from that much more exasperating class of art critics who deal in flourishes of literary eloquence, from which nothing definite is to be learned—loose splotches of colour without definition. He is, in particular, almost an ideal critic of Velasquez; for, as he confesses, he is an impressionist by temperament. You must, indeed, consequently allow for an avowed natural prejudice against what he calls decorative aim in painting (he gives unusual extension to the term so as to cover even the great Venetians); but he is large-mindedly conscious of this, and discounts it, endeavouring, so far as may be, to eliminate it from his general conclusions. To criticise Velasquez, assuredly a convinced impressionist is needful.

Spain is not a land of great ideals, of high spirituality: it has not developed the inner consciousness, like Germany; nor, like France, consummately cultivated the material consciousness. But it is the land where the sense of personal dignity has reached its loftiest expression. It is the land of the Hidalgo. It is the land of Quixote. A grave rhetoric characterises much of its literature and its art. Most appropriately, for final blossom of its art, it produced the founder of the personal style in painting, which we call Impressionism. The most modern of modern art has found in him its master and exemplar; for being concerned nowadays with ourselves, we needed an art which should teach us to see ourselves greatly. But the founder remains supreme. To go no further, his Spanish dignity gave an elevation to his seeing which is lacking in most modern impressionists, however masterly otherwise. The revolution he has worked in England, through such men as Whistler and Sargent, is great. It extends to the very teaching of our schools. The state of things which till lately prevailed, the piecemeal working and scrutiny of nature, is scathingly described by Mr. Stevenson:

Many people must have seen English painters who went out of their way to confuse their eyesight and destroy all unity of impression. Some begin a large landscape at the top of one corner, and finish it all the way down bit by bit. . . . These make a tunnel with their hands to shut out everything but the one patch of colour they are matching. These hold up white paper to gauge a value; these match tints upon a palette-knife held against the hues of nature; these cut holes in a card to look through; and these peep through their legs, their half-shut eyes, or into a small black mirror. . . . I have often seen men painting sunsets who would shade out the sky with a hat or hand that they might see what they were pleased to call the true colour of the ground. Of course, the grass instantly became of quite another colour to what it had been when the sky entered the painter's eyes at the same time. But they seemed unaware that they were painting by this process two quite different effects in one frame.

Mr. Ruskin, though aware that colours are altered by juxtaposition, is yet responsible for the cardboard device; as that great critic is responsible for many mistaken theories and practices. Wherein lay the originality of Velasquez? He sought his principle of unity in imitating the actual colour-relations of nature, seen and grasped as a whole, in their reciprocal interdependence. Whereas the painters with whom he may most nearly be compared studied things separately, and endeavoured to unify them either by a decorative system of colour-harmony and harmonies of line, like Rubens and the Venetians; or by chiaroscuro, like Rembrandt. It is in the Prado of Madrid, says Mr. Stevenson, that this supremacy of Velasquez can best be realised. There alone can his mature work be studied in bulk; and beside it even Rembrandt looks incomplete. In the Rembrandt group individually realistic figures are combined by an artificial harmony of chiaroscuro, slurring over the falsity of relative value. In Velasquez the group is united by a comprehensive perception of colour-values, studied not merely in their reciprocal effect, but as modified by the incidence of light on varying planes, and under varying conditions of atmospheric perspective. For it is obvious that even modelling is not a mere matter of light and dark, but a subtly-changing colour-pattern, caused by the numerous planes of surface. In the same way chiaroscuro and the effects of atmosphere reveal themselves by their effects on the value of colour. It is only artificially that we separate them, and in Velasquez they are not separated. It is in this command of values that his power lies; and in the wonderfully trained gift of eye by which, in the most complex groups, he grasped such values whole and interdependent—not in carefully studied parts, which become false when they are arbitrarily assembled. For this reason, also, he is the first and greatest master of atmosphere, with its magical effects on the local qualities of colour—the quality which a coloured robe, for example, has, viewed merely from the milliner's standpoint.

Velasquez, therefore, not merely perceived these things most delicately, but perceived them with a single eye. And this, as opposed to the study of nature part by part, and the necessarily unrelated putting together of those parts (brought into a conventional relation by some arbitrary device of colour, line, or chiaroscuro), is what we understand by Impressionism. It also deserves that name because it is peculiarly dependent on the authority of the painter's personal way of sight—since no two temperaments perceive a given ensemble of relations alike. Nor must it be supposed that we use the term "conventional" in aught but a relative sense; that any art can do more than approximate to nature. Impressionism is simply a less conventional convention. It can become a very intolerable convention in the hands of those who lack the authoritative eye which—beyond all other methods of art—it exacts, and without which it is unjustified!

Velasquez himself (it is a point for the young impressionist in a hurry) neither attained this way of art, nor acquired the magisterial perfection of eye which made it possible, till the close of a crowded artistic life. He began by the severe study of nature, like the painters before him, and trained himself by successive attention to various powers of art, before he learned to combine and eliminate—combine all requisite powers, eliminate all aims unessential to his end. In the early "Forge of Vulcan" Mr. Stevenson finds him a student of modelling, after the style of Caravaggio, and relying on a brown medium for harmony of tone. In "The Topers" he shows strong realism as regards the individual figures, without true realism of relation. The bust of the young "Philip IV." has searching, but too rigid, drawing. Then he went to Italy, and came back enamoured of the Venetians, of Titian, and, above all, Tintoretto. With that began his middle period, marked by grand decorative aim and sometimes a more positive colour than he afterwards used. The "Surrender of Breda" is the masterpiece of this period; while in the National Gallery we have the fine "Admiral Pulido Pareja." Only in his third and latest period he put forth the great series of works which mark the attainment of his mature and impressionist ideal.

In their possession Madrid is rich, despite Cuba and Manila. Take, for example, the splendid "Las Meninas," which even in a small reproduction such as that of Mr. Stevenson's book gives some suggestion of what must be the glories of the original. A large, gloomy room in the palace, the foreground occupied by the little Infanta and her attendants: from the obscurity of the middle distance loom the figure of Velasquez himself on the left, and two others on the right; at the back a small mirror reflects the faces of the King and Queen; while still more remotely seen through an open door a courtier is drawing back a curtain. The effect produced with this material is superb. The foreground illumination is concentrated on the charming figure of the small Infanta, with wonderful dignity of result, yet without false lighting. This may be compared with certain modern pictures, where the same effect is trickily sought at the expense of all truth in light. The eye is led back with marvellous mystery and beauty through the successive planes of the dim spaces, till it comes to rest on the figure of the courtier—a mere fly on the window-pane, but singularly effective in his perspective setting. The most delicate atmosphere modulates everything. Nay, here as elsewhere, Mr. Stevenson shows that Velasquez employed atmosphere as a portion of the composition in a way unknown to the schools before him. The heads of the figures are low down, almost on a level, yet the canvas towers up above them; that upper space is filled with nothing but atmosphere. A darkness dimly populous with light engrosses it, producing all the effect of loftiest composition. It is not an accident of background, but an integral portion of the picture.

More capable of representation on a small scale is the full-length of the philosopher "Æsopus." "The most cleverly handled of all Velasquez' heads," says Mr. Stevenson, "it is the one that best supports the legend of his swaggering dexterity in flourishing a paint-brush. It is a rough impasto woven into a most marvellously expressive texture, which is, unfortunately, quite unreplicable in illustrations." But the admirable character of the face, nevertheless, remains. Velasquez had no set handling. His brush-work alters with the mood and aim of the painting, differing with differently placed figures in one and the same picture. Let Mr. Stevenson describe a totally unlike handling in the little bust of "Philip IV." (Prado, 1080):

It may be noted for the sweet finesse of the modelling, the lovely black of the clothes, and a command of colour in close ranges so supreme that the local tints of the flesh are preserved, and cannot anywhere be confounded with the soft iridescence of the luminous envelope. One feels that it goes beyond human powers in the intimacy of its modelling. It seems to challenge nature in finish, and one almost resents that art and nature should both triumph to this extent on the same canvas.

Hence more than any painter Velasquez can stand the terrible test of collective exhibition. There is no sameness; each painting is a fresh intention. Mr. Stevenson defends his habit in colour of dealing chiefly with the silvery play of light on wonderfully cadenced blacks, and his infrequent use of anything like bright colour. Perhaps it was not merely temperament. He may have felt that nature's brilliant effects did not lend themselves to subtle truth of value. Even Manet attains his results of intense light by a convention which is actually false, which relies on the fallaciousness of the human eye.

We cannot follow Mr. Stevenson through his searching and admirable analysis of Velasquez' art in all its nuances and problems. No painter involves more discussion of vital principles, and Mr. Stevenson handles his task luminously. The one little objection we have is a tendency to excessive illustration from other arts—always dangerous—which leads him at times into perilously omniscient assertion.

"That Old Little Crooked Souldier."

The Life and Campaigns of Alexander Leslie, First Earl of Leven. By Charles Sanford Terry, M.A. (Longmans, Green & Co. 16s.)

To read this book in conjunction with The Legend of Montrose is to realise what an enormous advantage the novelist has over the historian. From a few hints Scott built up for us the immortal Dugald Dalgetty, the Scottish mercenary of the Thirty Years' War, with all his faults and foibles, good qualities and bad blended into a living human being. It is imagination, but it is more true than history. The Major lives with us still. Mr. Terry has the same material to work on, but is too faithful and conscientious to make the best use of it. In history Leslie is but a name. When "the Solemn League and Covenant" was signed in Greyfriars' Churchyard, and King Charles in a rage swore "I will rather die than yield to these impertinent and damnable demands," there was called to take command of the insurgent forces "ane gentleman of base birth, borne in Balveny, who had servit long and fortunately in the Germane warris." He was close on threescore years of age, and for thirty years had, like Major Dalgetty, fought under Gustavus Adolphus, "bot," writes Baillie, "such was the wisdom and authoritie of that old little crooked souldier that all with ane incredible submission gave themselves to be guided by him, as if he had been Great Solyman."

ALEXANDER LESLIE.
First Earl of Leven.

Leslie's is a promising figure, but it remains waxwork—it never breathes the breath of life. Yet Mr. Terry has unearthed many romantic suggestions. Leslie may almost be said to have been born in the camp. His father was captain of the castle of Blair, in Athole; of his mother nothing is known, except that she was a "wench in Rannoch." Strangely enough, Mr. Hay Fleming has discovered the fact that this libertine captain, many a year after, when his son was already one of the veterans of Adolphus, "made an honest woman," as the Scotch say, of the erstwhile frail Rannoch lass. We say strangely, because there is but a bare chronicle of the event—it might appear natural enough if all the circumstances were known. Of the "little crooked old man" himself there is a half-length painting in Melville House, reproduced here as a frontispiece—it shows a portly little sexagenarian, almost foppishly got up in lace and ruffles, with pointed beard and curled moustache, and a miniature of the great Adolphus hanging on his breast; a sombre, quiet-looking face, showing little or no outward sign of the ability he must have possessed, since he outshone in valour and generalship all the crowd of Scottish cavaliers who sought their fortunes in Germany during the Thirty Years' War.

But he seems to have been a very illiterate man, and he who can neither write nor talk will soon fall a prey to oblivion. His letters and despatches must have been—as it is said he could barely write his own signature—dictated to a scribe or secretary; at any rate, they are very featureless productions, without a scintilla of originality or specific character. Nor is any pithy or memorable saying of his reported. The only event that seems ever to have developed in him a touch of emotion was the death of his great commander. At other times he seems to have kept his feelings well in hand. When his wife died he was too much engrossed in affairs to attend her funeral, and how and where he himself breathed his last remains a mystery.

In truth, Alexander Leslie, first Earl of Leven, was little more than a fighting machine, and it is absurd to institute any comparison, as was once the fashion, between him and his great rival, Oliver Cromwell, who was a statesman as well as a soldier. Lord Viscount Moore, probably, was not far from the mark when he observed to a couple of his friends "that the Earle of Leven's actions made not such a noyse in the world as those of Generall Leslie." Naturally at sixty a leader is apt to be more cautious and circumspect than he was a score of years before. And from first to last he appears to have been grasping and avaricious. He started in life at twenty penniless and illegitimate. But fortunes could be really picked up in the wars then. In 1640, says Mr. Terry, "a credulous intelligencer valued the clothes he went to church in at £2,000"—an exaggeration, no doubt; yet, even after a large discount has been made, evidence of wealth and ostentation. In 1635 he purchased the Barony of Balgoney, in Fife, and the lands of Craigincat and East Nisbit, in Berwickshire. About the same time he acquired Bogilie from the Boswells of Balmuto, and in 1650 the estate of Inchmartin, in the Carse of Gowrie. Plainly, therefore, he had had his pickings in battle.

Numberless are the contemporary allusions to his love of plunder.

We can after all, then, frame some sort of picture of this soldier of fortune. Whether he got any further in his alphabet than "g," or not—and Lord Hailes has preserved a witty story to prove the negative—it is certain that he was totally destitute of "book-learn." That, as the parvenu's manner is, he delighted in outward pomp and show would be evident from his portrait, even if the jeers of his contemporaries had not been preserved; that he could be simple, quiet, and wise in council is equally evident from the conciliatory influence he exerted when in command of the hitherto discordant Scottish army.

It remains only to ask what he did—the most important question of all, perhaps; though what he was is the more interesting. Passing over the years of his service with Gustavus, we find that he justified the choice of him as a Scottish general by transforming the bands of Covenanters from a shapeless conglomeration of bands into a disciplined and effective military force. Among an army of zealot preachers and enthusiasts he had the advantage to be a practical soldier, accustomed to fight when he was commanded, and little moved by the cries of faction. At Duns he virtually compelled Charles to make a complete surrender; and he achieved his end bloodlessly by steady generalship. That was in 1639; and in 1640, at a very slight expenditure of fighting material at Newburn, he forced Conway and Astley to evacuate Newcastle, and gave England the Parliament "which so much was looked for, from which so much resulted." In 1644 "he cleared the North of the Royalist garrisons, and both planned and shared the victory of Marston Moor," says Mr. Terry. He himself, however, fled before the victory was won; "he galloped off the field, nor drew bridle till he reached Leeds," relates our author, following Somerville. Throughout the difficult crisis of 1645 he continued to hold the north with an army ill-clothed, ill-fed, and ill-paid.

On the whole, then, he may be described as a Dugald Dalgetty with the humour left out; a mercenary loyal to his paymasters; a crafty, skilful master of war, ready to go where he was sent, and to fight when he was bid, but, as far as we can see, destitute of any settled policy or conviction of his own: a mere machine for carrying out the ideas of others.

Mr. Terry's labours, however, are not to be wholly judged by this centre-piece of his picture. He has brought together a vast number of documents that illustrate the relationship between England and Scotland at a time when they were peculiarly interesting. In that way his book is a valuable addition to the literature of knowledge.

A Scourge for Players.

The Actor and his Art: Some Considerations of the Present Condition of the Stage. By Stanley Jones. (Downey & Co. 3s. 6d.)

MR. "STANLEY JONES" (whoever he may be) has audaciously lifted his stick and smashed the window of the enclosed chamber wherein the histrion resides. The free and biting wind of frank criticism rushes turbulently through that room from which hitherto even draughts have been excluded. Pouf! The very gods are blown over, and roll about helpless in this terrible breeze. The spectacle amuses; or rather one snatches a somewhat fearful joy from it. But one cannot help feeling sorry for the gods; one can scarcely resist a desire to set them on their feet and offer them the old accustomed worship. Such treatment of gods is at the least unusual, and—to them—surely incomprehensible. The owner of many a name mentioned in this witty book must have rubbed his eyes as he read, and asked himself whether or no he dreamt. And his uncertainty would be natural and proper, for it is many years now since the Press entered tacitly into that agreement under which, in speaking of things histrionic, it always exaggerates praise, and diminishes blame to the vanishing point. That agreement, or convention, is one of the most curious and sacred "social contracts" that ever existed—sacred because the most fearless journalists, the most powerful newspapers, accept it as binding; curious because the Press does everything and gets nothing in return. How did it originate? Why should the Press exercise good nature for the pleasure of doing so? Why, if it is lenient to players, should it not extend the same leniency to dramatists? None seems to know. The only ascertained fact is, there is no bribery. Apropos of this, Mr. Jones quotes the saying of Sir Augustus Harris when he was once accused of trying to bribe the Press: "'Bribe the Press?' he said jocularly, 'I wish I could. For ten years I have been trying to find the way to do it.'" And Mr. Jones adds: "One might as well try to bribe the House of Commons." Which, though it is probably true, makes the matter all the more mysterious. Of course there are critics (a band très select) who ignore the widespread convention of kindness. It may be said that Mr. Stanley Jones is prominently one of these. His book is a wholesale attack on the modern stage, an attack which would be better if it were not contemptuous. In the main, without doubt, it is well founded, being based on two or three notorious truths. No one but a member of the theatrical profession would be likely to disagree with it seriously. Indeed, there are people who would call it trite and unnecessary—a rearrangement of common knowledge. For ourselves, we think that it can't do harm, and may do good—despite the statement of the Athenaeum quoted by Mr. Jones, that "actors do not buy books connected with their profession, even if they buy books at all."

It was inevitable, we suppose, that Mr. Stanley Jones should direct the full force of his onslaught against the actor-manager. To those who would reform the stage, the actor-manager has always fulfilled the function of a red rag to a bull. The stage is in a rotten condition, says Mr. Jones in effect, and the reason is the actor-manager. The argument is that when the actor-manager acts and manages, the interests of dramatic and histrionic art are made subservient to his personal vanity and predilections:

The stage suffers in yet another way by the authority which the actor-manager exercises over the theatre. He regards himself as the principal factor in every piece in which he appears, and his choice of plays is thus restricted to such works as he finds suitable to his own individual peculiarities, or to such as his ambition (which is only a polite term for vanity) urges him to produce. Reversing the proper process, the common practice is now for an actor to adapt a play to himself instead of adapting himself to the play. The actor-manager, in nine cases out of ten, sits for his portrait. The actor who is his own manager is in a position to dictate terms, and the dramatist must accept his fate. Thus the elevation of the actor often means the degradation of the drama, for the dramatist is no longer free to follow his own inclinations, but must write, in nine cases out of ten, with an understanding of the aspirations and limitations of an actor-manager.

declined a play in which there was too much of the heroine with the ingenuous remarks: "Where do I come in? I don't intend to produce plays with any woman in the leading part." In short, if some disinterested manager cannot be induced to change this policy, the heroine's diminished head will presently disappear altogether from the drama. Where, indeed, are the actresses?

Where, indeed? Where are Miss Alma Murray and Miss Elizabeth Robins? And where, except at intervals, is Mrs. Patrick Campbell?

But, though the actor-manager is indubitably human, it is by no means proved that he is the primal cause of the puerility of the English stage. The drama, like every other art, flourishes and fades, fades and flourishes. But the ebb and flow of a nation's artistic imagination are not controlled by passing vogues in the internal economy of the theatre. We happen now to be at the ebb. Perhaps the tide has turned; perhaps it hasn't. In either case the existence of the actor-manager won't affect it—no more than Canute influenced another tide. And as with the art of drama, so with the art of histrionics. If we have only one great actor and two great actresses, that is not the fault of the actor-manager. The actor-manager has not killed off dramatists of genius or actors of genius. Had he done so, their graves would be notorious. Where are these suppressed dramatists, and these unacted masterpieces? They do not exist. The simple unaided fact of their existence would be too much for the serried ranks of all the actor-managers. It is a law of nature that fine work gets itself heard, in one way or another; and quickly too. We know that some of the leading London managements are again and again at their wit's end for a play, and we feel sure that in their extremity they would be willing to produce even a fine play. There never was a time when young dramatists had a better chance than to-day. Let a man write even a curtain-raiser that succeeds moderately, and within a week he will find on his breakfast-table offers from the first managers of the West End. He will get cables from America. And what is more, he will receive money down for work uncommenced. And this in an era of actor-managers! Further, all theatres are not under the sinister sway of the actor-manager. What of those others which are free from his bane? Mr. George Edwardes has scarcely advanced the cause of art, nor the Messrs. Gatti. Nor was Mr. Comyns Carr strikingly successful when he took the Comedy Theatre. The plain truth is that no machinery except the machinery which includes an actor-manager has proved capable of combining popular success with a moderate degree of artistic achievement. And let us remember that artistic achievement is valuable only in so far as it succeeds. Better not to play it at all than to play a masterpiece to empty seats. There is no virtue in mere performance. That actor-managers have made disinterested efforts on behalf of dramatic art is beyond dispute. Mr. George Alexander will not soon forget "The Divided Way" and "Guy Domville," but he need never be ashamed of them. Mr. Tree will not soon forget the French pantomime play which he produced with "The Seats of the Mighty"—an exquisite thing foredoomed, as he must have well known, to a reception far below zero in its frostiness.

We do not seek to defend the actor-manager from the charges which Mr. Stanley Jones brings against him. We only insist that to accuse him of being a serious obstacle to the rise of the drama, or a factor in its fall, is to confuse minor phenomena with first causes. We cannot but agree with Mr. Jones's strictures against actor-managers and actors generally. He says that actors are vain, unbusinesslike, too fond of publicity, and ignorant. As a class, they are: it is notorious, but it is de rigueur not to mention the fact. Of the ignorance of actors he gives an admirable instance, self-confessed by the late Edward Righton:

"When 'The Happy Land' was read to the artists"—I am quoting Mr. Righton's words—"few, if any of us, I am afraid, saw its real point. . . . Nobody is more ready for a genuine guffaw than an actor when he sees the gist of a joke, and I think the harshest thing that could be said of our want of penetration on that occasion was that we were none of us posted up in the politics of the day." We can find nothing harsher to say than that the author did not overrate the intelligence of the public in assuming them to be better informed than the actors. It is Mr. Righton who suggests, if I do not misunderstand him, that the actor does not share the common interest in public affairs.

Of the actor's lack of business qualities, of his vanity, and of his "passion for publicity," nothing needs to be said. Anyone who has brushed the fringe of the theatre—anyone who has even sat among the "resting" players in the dress-circle on a first night—must be well aware of them, and most people will prefer to be silent about them. Mr. Jones, however, gives some extremely funny examples, with names and dates. He spares no one. Some of his quotations from the Era newspaper, the "actor's bible," are delicious, and the remarks of actors to kindly interviewers are not less amusing.

On the whole, though Mr. Jones is markedly personal, he is seldom offensive—or rather he would not be deemed offensive by a man of ordinary sensibilities. His wit is sometimes very pretty indeed, as when he says of Sir Henry Irving that he "is not the man to spoil the ship for a thousand-pounds' worth of tar." The Actor and His Art, we repeat, is a wholesale attack; we have touched only on parts of it. In our view it is a salutary work, but it would have been more salutary if Mr. Jones had supplemented his attack with a reasoned explanation of the phenomena involved.

A Preacher's Life.

A Preacher's Life: An Autobiography and an Album. By Joseph Parker. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

THE author says in his Preface: "It is impossible for any man to write exhaustively even his own biography." This is true, and it is a warning to the reader that he is not to expect a full, clear view of the minister of the City Temple. Many men do not understand their own lives, their own powers and influence; neither are they the best judges of the various forces which have contributed to their moral and mental development. For such to attempt to write their lives would be to court failure. To a certain extent Dr. Parker is one of these men. His autobiography by no means exhausts the subject, though it has a peculiar charm, freshness, and interest as coming from his own mind and pen.

Dr. Parker gives the frame-work of his outer career, and not more than a frame-work. He is a "Tyne child," and delights to tell of the place of his birth, and the home in which he spent his boyhood. He was born in Hexham, "with its venerable abbey, the hoary church of the parish which has outlasted the coming and the going of twelve hundred years." Those who watched over the spiritual well-being of the inhabitants were objects of intense interest to him in his boyhood. Strange to say, he was more friendly with the Rev. Michael Singleton, the Roman Catholic priest, than with the Rev. William Airey, "a large, sleek, well-to-do Protestant, who took the Reformation stipend quietly and diligently, and literally obeyed the Act of Uniformity without an intellectual spasm or tremour of misgiving."

His parents were not anonymous personages. The mother was tender, and had other eyes than those which belonged to the body, "saw visions and dreamt dreams"; and the father was strong in will, firm in principle, and held fast to views of the Supreme Being which no weak mind could have entertained. Under the paternal roof the public men of the village met in the evenings, when discussions took place on the gravest subjects. Religion had a firmer hold on the villagers than literature or politics, and its problems were examined at solemn consultations. Young Joseph Parker was an eager listener, and had his thoughts early turned in the direction of sacred themes. The formal education of the boy was irregular. He had three teachers, the first of whom "was, as to violence of temper, a fiend, notwithstanding which" the youth made progress in his studies, and became fit to be successor to his third schoolmaster.

I remember the circular, a prospectus in which I announced my succession to my former chief and teacher.

I called the school Ebenezer Seminary, though for what reason I have no recollection, possibly because the school-room was attached to the Independent Chapel, and therefore was supposed to have about it an odour of sanctity, and be worthy of a Bible name. I offered to teach grammar, algebra, Latin, Greek, and book-keeping by single and double entry, the prospectus concluding with the awe-inspiring words: "The conductor of Ebenezer Seminary does not undertake to supply his pupils with brains." This was frank on the part of a youth who was about nineteen years of age, yet the announcement enabled him to maintain the attitude of freezing reserve.

A youth with this spirit could not remain long at the task of endeavouring to teach children with or without brains. Soon he felt a burning desire to be a preacher. This grew with his years, and, as if by inspiration, he made the plunge, and became ere he was aware a popular preacher on the village green. Dr. Parker tells how he went to London when twenty-two years of age, and how he was received, trained by, and associated with the Rev. Dr. John Campbell, the leader of Congregationalism in those days, and one before whom few could stand. In 1853 he went to Banbury, then to Manchester in 1858, where he had a most successful pastorate, and received and accepted a call to London in 1869. What he has accomplished since then, first in the Poultry Chapel, and finally in the City Temple, is partially known. The author does not deal with this large subject, but leaves it for others to relate. It will doubtless be told one day, and will be a tale which, in some respects, is unrivalled in the history of the Nonconformist Churches of Britain.

Much of the value of this work lies in the history of the inner side of the author's life it portrays. The evangelical form of religion was the one which commended itself to his mind and heart, and in it, from earliest days, he had a firm belief. In a thoughtful chapter, Dr. Parker gives what he calls "the history of my soul," in which he explains the truths which inspired and sustained his ministry during all the years of its course.

Personally, I have accepted what is known as the evangelical interpretation of the Gospel, because I believe that the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, as evangelically interpreted, responds to more necessities and supplies better motives for service than any other conception of the Kingdom of God.

Though accepting this and making it the main feature of his preaching, Dr. Parker is not to be ranked with those who are frequently termed "Gospel Preachers." His Gospel takes in all the works, the ways, and the words of God. It is revealed in all the facts, dreams, visions, songs, prophecies, gospels and epistles of the Bible. Christ is to him the explanation of all things, and the Cross the fullest revelation of Christ. This faith, we are told, is secure, and "is no more endangered by the enlargement of lexicons and grammars than the moral purpose of life is impaired by climate, or the supremacy of conscience is modified by custom or language."

Dr. Parker is an Independent of Independents. He has never been anything else. If he had been an Episcopalian he would have given his bishop no end of trouble, and if he had been a Presbyterian he would seldom have been absent from the bar of the Synod or Assembly. He has much to say concerning the principles of Nonconformity and the practice of Nonconformists. It is with a sigh that he surveys Dissent in these days, and compares it with what it was sixty years ago.

Nonconformity has now slumberously evolved into milk and water, sold in large bottles labelled "Charity." What wonder that Nonconformity is anaesthetic, and tottering on its shivering pins? When I first knew it, Dissent was full of purpose, and a force to be reckoned with; now it lives too much on statistics and apologies. Once, if so much as a beast touched its mountain, it was thrust through with a dart. Now Dissent hobnobs with the opposition, and eats sandwiches in ecclesiastical picnics amidst the grieved solitudes of the Alps!

The volume is divided into three sections: the first, "Personal and Pastoral"; the second, "Literary and Controversial"; and the third, "An Album." In the last section there are "pen-and-ink" sketches of various public men, which abound with illustrative anecdotes and descriptions. Mr. Gladstone has the place of honour, and some interesting glimpses are given of that statesman. Here is a little picture:

When Henry Ward Beecher was my guest, Mr. Gladstone, who was then Prime Minister, wrote me a note asking that Mr. Beecher and myself would take breakfast with him at Downing-street. The illustrious preacher was only too glad, as was I myself, to have an opportunity of meeting the greatest man of England at close quarters. I can never forget the reception which Mr. Gladstone gave to his visitors, who mustered in considerable numbers and represented considerable variety of religious and political opinion. Judging by his manner, one would think that he had no experience of care or anxiety or worry of any kind. . . . Yet, on the very night of that day he and his Cabinet placed their resignation in the hands of the Queen.

Henry Ward Beecher, Thomas Binney, George Gilfillan, Norman Macleod, and R. W. Dale are in the author's Portrait Gallery. They are sketched by a steady hand and a genial heart. The chapter "An Irreparable Loss," in the first section, is a touching sketch of the author's wife, who was taken from him recently. To many this volume will prove a book of deep interest, especially to those who desire to understand the workings of this strong personality, who for more than half a century has addressed thousands of his fellow men on all that concerns their character, their life, and their destiny.

JAMES HOGG.

BY SIR GEORGE DOUGLAS.

We suppose there are still a few English readers who read the Noctes Ambrosianae and find it amusing, but Sir George Douglas points out that the Noctes created and perpetuated a very false impression of Hogg. It was a curious situation in which Hogg's rather weak vanity and good-humour placed him. Month by month he read in Blackwood dialogues in which he was made to utter sentiments which were as new to him as to the public. He bore each shock for the sake of the notoriety; but we are told that Mrs. Hogg, who survived her husband thirty-five years, was wont to express a wifely indignation when she recalled certain of the Noctes; and Hogg's daughter said that Wilson's Ettrick Shepherd was not "the Shepherd his own home knew."

As a poet Hogg had more sensitiveness than has been credited to him, or than his usual sturdy, easy-going nature might suggest. Witness these lines from The Queen's Wake:

Unknown to men of sordid heart,
What joys the poet's hopes impart;
Unknown, how his high soul is torn
By cold neglect, or canting scorn:
That meteor torch of mental light,
A breath can quench, or kindle bright.
Oft has that mind, which braved serene
The shafts of poverty and pain,
The Summer toil, the Winter blast,
Fallen victim to a frown at last.
Easy the boon he asks of thee;
O, spare his heart in courtesy!

Sir George Douglas has written a very sympathetic little biography which brings Hogg before us as he was—farmer, poet, and story-writer. Hogg's most triumphant gifts were his ability to invest a Scottish ghost story with reality, and in his humorous insight into rustic character. This little book is an excellent addition to the "Famous Scots" series. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 1s. 6d.)

SIR JOHN EVERETT MILLAIS:
HIS ART AND INFLUENCE.

BY A. L. BALDRY.

WE are shortly to have a complete biography of Sir John Everett Millais by his son. Meanwhile there is no reason why competent critics should not deal with Millais's art and influence within smaller compass. Mr. A. L. Baldry gives us a great deal of information about Millais's long toil as a painter, and he emphasises the fact about which there can be least dispute—viz., Millais's genius for drawing. We are told that when, in 1838, the Duke of Sussex, presiding at the distribution of prizes by the Society of Arts, called for "Mr. Millais," the company were amazed to see a child in a pinafore come shyly forward to receive the silver medal for drawing from the antique. A born draughtsman, Millais soon showed that he had any amount of intelligence and imagination of a healthy English sort. His eye for colour was both correct and original, and the virility of the man was never absent from his work.

ST. AGNES'S EVE.

A Drawing by Sir John Millais from Tennyson's Poems, 1857.

In short, Millais's powers were of a splendid order; but it is impossible to feel that they were ever co-ordinated by a lofty and all-embracing aim, or that they were ever marshalled to do the best work of which he was capable. The fact is, that Millais was a great, breezy Englishman, whose talent was allied to robust health rather than to any persuasion of his soul. He did his finest work when he was most under the discipline and in the company of men who did strictly meditate their rather thankless Muse. When he broke away, he became everything except a great or a lasting force. Mr. Baldry's treatment of Millais's defection from the Pre-Raphaelites is curious: "When he felt that he had the chance to extend his authority beyond the limits of a purely professional agitation, and to touch a larger public than would have been within his reach if he had continued only to advocate the extreme views that agreed well enough with his early enthusiasm, he very wisely did not waste his opportunity." That is to say, he prepared to paint "Bubbles."

On the whole, Mr. Baldry is on safer ground when dealing with Millais's black-and-white work. This was nearly all produced under the Pre-Raphaelite influence. It is uniformly strong and careful, and the reproduction we give of one of Millais's illustrations to Tennyson's Poems, done in 1857, is as typical as any. (Bell & Sons. 7s. 6d. net)

THE ART OF THINKING.

BY T. SHARPER KNOWLSON.

WE do not wish to flout Mr. Knowlson. Every one of his pages is as modest as we could wish it to be. Still, we cannot help wondering why he is not Prime Minister of England. He purposes to teach the art of thought to anyone who reads his book. That necessarily implies an assumption on his part that he himself is a master of thought. Why, then, is this the first occasion on which we have heard his name? On any reasonable analogy, we are obliged to feel that he should by this time have been the peer of Plato and Lord Salisbury. As he is not, we have to seek for a reason why; and we find it in his book. Here is a sample of his didactic thinking:

We want men and women of all-round activities who will set apart an hour for thought's own sake, and thus fulfil the exhortation of a wise man whose practice it was to "sort his thoughts and label them." Such a habit would not only be good in itself: it would increase mental efficiency in every department of life. Mme. Swetchine says that to have ideas is to gather flowers; to think is to weave them into garlands. There could be no happier synonym for thinking than the word weaving—a putting together of the best products of observation, reading, experience, and travel, so as to represent a patterned whole, representing its design from the weaver's own mind. We have plenty of flowers; we want more garlands. We have libraries, books, and newspapers; we want more thinkers.

Do we, indeed? How are we to treat the brilliant creatures when they arrive? Are we to lay ourselves at their patent-leather feet, and say, "Great pundits, teach us, oh, teach us, to think"? How the deuce could they obey our imprecation? "Go to," they would say, if they answered us at all—"go to, ye groundlings: we are not masters of hedge-schools, nor are we philanthropists of any sort: we are sovereigns, some of us, and cabinet ministers (the others), and have no time to attend to you." That were the natural and proper answer. A man who thinks supremely does not teach the art to others. When Mr. Sharper Knowlson becomes the exception to that rule we shall listen to him with much regard. We hope that by that time he will have perceived that a flower is a thing more beautiful than a garland. That is to say, we hope he shall have become a thinker. (Warne. 2s. 6d.)

THE EUROPEAN TOUR.

BY GRANT ALLEN.

In this volume, with breathless haste and the utmost confidence, Mr. Allen instructs American and Colonial tourists how to get the best intellectual value from a visit to the old country and the Continent. The book is the completest piece of literary buttonholing we have ever seen. Mr. Allen holds his pupils and talks to them for three hundred pages. Nothing but the circumstance that the end of the work is reached puts an end to the amazing vivacity, vigour, knowledge, and dogmatism of this lightning Baedeker—this bovrilised Murray. Do this; go there; avoid this; on no account do that, says Mr. Allen, resorting for emphasis to various typographical devices. Here is a specimen passage:

Formerly Americans at least gave more time to Paris and less to London than is now usual. I think the older plan was the better one; the change is mostly due to social causes. "Fashionable" Americans who want to know marquises spend some months in London; other Americans who have too much good sense to desire such acquaintances follow their footsteps by pure habit. But if you will take my advice, you will go first to the Continent; you can then return to London later, should you think it worth while. I am not afraid, however, that you will think it worth while; on the contrary, when you come to see how much there is to learn in France, Belgium, and (above all) Italy, you will thank me for having saved you from wasting your days in Piccadilly.

And here is another:

Don't go first to Rome. I regard that point as of so great importance that I will even repeat it in all the dignity of capitals: DON'T GO FIRST TO ROME. If you do, you will never so well understand Italy. To see Venice before you have seen Florence is a serious mistake; to see Rome before you have seen Florence is a fatal blunder.

Mr. Allen is quite aware that his advice is open to criticism. At the end of the London chapters he says so: "Let me add that in all this I am only pretending to give one man's view"; and the confession rather cuts the ground from the critic. It is, perhaps, as much as need be said about the book—that we find ourselves prepared to take Mr. Allen's advice more often than not. (Richards. 6s.)

Fiction.

The Path of a Star. By Sara Jeannette Duncan.
(Methuen. 6s.)

Mrs. COTES is apparently no longer satisfied to portray the lighter side of life, the humours of travel, and comedy almost farcical in the ends of the earth. In The Path of a Star she has written a very serious study of Anglo-Indian manners. One cannot but admire such determined grappling with nature as is displayed on nearly every page of this novel. At the same time, the final impression which the book leaves is an impression of annoyance. For Mrs. Cotes's seriousness has played havoc with her clear fluency. Not only life, but language, must be taken like an orange and squeezed dry. She will use no word but she will extract the last drop of significance from it. And her sentences—let us here change the metaphor—are not permitted to shirk. They stagger under their loads of meaning and suggestion, and not infrequently is added unto them that last straw which breaks the camel's back. The first paragraph in the book is an example of Mrs. Cotes at her busiest with the English language. The result—there is only one adjective to describe the result: it is vicious. Meredithese raised to the nth power would not surpass in pain and difficulty some of Mrs. Cotes's most conscientious efforts after precision in the conveyance of a subtlety. Her feats in wrenching words away from their plain sense occasionally reduce one to the silence of awe. "The air was gay with the dimpling of piano notes." In the name of the New English Dictionary, what is this? Only a little further on is: "'It's pay,' she cried, with pleasure dimpling about her lips." One could guess at that, but the vision of piano notes by their dimpling adding gaiety to the air—it amazes!

Translate The Path of a Star into English, and you will find a carefully-stippled picture of Anglo-Indian life; not the laughter of Simla, but the frowns of Calcutta. There is a good deal of Indian Salvation Army in the tale. One of the heroines is a Salvation lass—Captain Laura Filbert, to wit. This portion of the novel appears to us to be the best. The minor character of Ensign Sand, a friend of the captain's, is drawn with distinction:

"What kind of meetin' did you have?" asked Mrs. Sand. "There—there now; he shall have his bottle, so he shall!"

"A beautiful meeting. Abraham Lincoln White, the Savannah negro, you know, came as a believer for the first time, and so did Miss Rozario from Whiteaway and Laidlaw's. We had such a happy time."

"What sort of collection?"

Laura opened a knotted handkerchief and counted out some copper coins.

"Only seven annas three pice! And you call that a good meeting! I don't believe you exhorted them to give!"

"Oh, I think I did!" Laura returned mechanically.

"Seven annas and three pice! And you know what the Commissioner wrote out about our last quarter's earnings! What did you say?"

"I said—I said the collection would now be taken up," Laura faltered.

"Oh dear! oh dear! Leopold, stop clawing me! Couldn't you think of anythin' more tellin' or more touchin' than that? Fever or no fever, it does not do for me to stay away from the regular meetin's. One thing is plain—he wasn't there!"

"Who?"

"Well, you've never told me his name, but I expect you've got your reasons." Mrs. Sand's tone was not arch, but slightly resentful. "I mean the gentleman that attends so regular and sits behind, under the window. A society man, I should say, to look at him, though the officers of this Army are no respecters of persons, and I don't suppose the Lord takes any notice of his clothes."

The Path of a Star has earned our respect. It represents high endeavour. It is desperately "meant." Some of it we have really enjoyed. Much of it we have struggled with. We hope that in her next novel Mrs. Cotes will be a little more lenient towards her native tongue.

The King's Mirror. By Anthony Hope.
(Methuen. 6s.)

IN some ways this is Mr. Hope's pleasantest work. It lacks the vivacity of the Dolly Dialogues, the incident and momentum of The Prisoner of Zenda, but it has a ripeness, a mellowness, a grave and agreeable humour to which those books do not pretend. We have an idea, as we read, that this, to a degree unapproached by his other stories, is Mr. Hope's own book. There is more of himself in it; he values it more highly; it is his David Copperfield, to borrow a phrase from Mr. Crockett's publishers. When a clever novelist turns aside from tickling the public, and produces his own book, it is almost certain to be good; and Mr. Hope being a very clever novelist, his own book, The King's Mirror, is very good indeed. We have read it with constant enjoyment and that subcutaneous smile which goes with the perusal of the gentle cynicisms of a witty yet kindly satirist. For Augustin of Forstadt, the king whose autobiography, or "mirror," is contained in this volume, is a figure of singular charm. We cannot quite away with memories of Prince Otto as we read him, and yet Mr. Hope stands on his own feet throughout, and squarely too. The king's boyhood, his youth, his gallantries, his enforced courtship, his friendships, his duel with the Radical journalist—all are related with a spirit and a humorous intelligence which it would be hard to overpraise. And the steps by which the enforced courtship becomes a congenial matter are made plain by exquisitely delicate touches. The King's Mirror is, so far, its author's best as well as pleasantest work. We expect to find it treasured on the bookshelves when the other stories that now stand to Mr. Hope's name are forgotten. It is a genuine contribution to serious fiction and, withal, a book of unflagging charm.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE DIARY OF A SUPERFLUOUS MAN. BY IVAN TURGENEV.

This is the thirteenth volume in Mrs. Garnett's translation of the Russian novelist. Two more are to follow, both made up of his short stories, and the work will be complete in December. In addition to the title story, the present volume contains: "A Tour in the Forest," "Yakov Pasinov," "Andrei Kolosov," and "A Correspondence." (Heinemann. 3s. 6d.)

THE HUMAN INTEREST.

BY VIOLET HUNT.

Here we have Miss Hunt's clever observation and un-failing wit directed to a study of a cultured circle in Newcastle-on-Tyne, where we find a solicitor's wife sighing her soul out for the delights of London, and hear Mrs. Poynder's heavy, satisfied voice, saying: "Give me Newcastle!" There is also a Newcastle "po-utt," who wears his hair "nearly as long as po-utts do in London." (Methuen. 6s.)

ADAM GRIGSON.

BY MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.

A long and interesting novel by the author of Deborah of Tod's. It is a faithful study of character, and its general intention is an effort to work out the effects on family life of a mixing of classes by marriage. (Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

PRINCESS FEATHER.

BY A. C. INCHBOLD.

A novel of the school of Thomas Hardy. Not Wessex but Sussex is the background. Elizabeth Kemp, waiting-maid to Lady Apreece half a century ago, is the heroine, "Princess Feather" and "London Pride" being her name among the country folk; and the story tells of her luckless marriage to Michael Tagg, a masterful blackguard. It is a sombre book, introducing, unless we are much mistaken, a new writer of power. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

DANIEL WHYTE.

BY A. J. DAWSON.

A long and many-coloured life-story by the author of Middle Greyness and Bismillah. Daniel Whyte, who is a mere boy at the beginning of the book, after the good old-fashioned way, and grown man at the end of it, has a roving career—now at sea, now as a journalist, but always, in whatever circumstances, grave and self-contained. An interesting, mature work. (Methuen. 6s.)

LADY BARBARITY.

BY J. C. SNAITH.

A "romantic comedy," opening in 1746, and told in the first person by her ladyship in a very taking style. In the first chapter Lady Bab's father is preparing for death, and this is how he breaks the news to his daughter: "He laid his hand upon the Bible. 'Tis no secret, my dearest Bab, that Robert John, fifth Earl, your papa, never was an anchorite. He hath ta'en his fill of pleasure. He hath played his hazard, and with a zest both late and early; but now the candles sink, you see, and I believe they've called the carriage.' Again he laid his hand upon the Bible." (Ward, Lock & Co. 6s.)

THE TWO MISS JEFFREYS.

BY DAVID LYALL.

We have here fifteen short stories, which have only a slight connexion. They are full of the tender and humorous delineation of Scottish life which has marked Mr. Lyall's other books. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

TRICKS AND TRIALS.

BY CHRISTABEL COLERIDGE.

A quiet country-town story by the author of Waynflete and many other novels. On page 223 we read: "Crispin was not unaware that the idea might not be quite unwelcome to the Greenwoods." We have wrestled long with these negatives, and we have come to the conclusion that Crispin was aware that the idea would be welcome at the Greenwoods. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

A PLASTER SAINT.

BY ANNIE EDWARDS.

The hero, the Rev. George Gervase, is the plaster saint, and we see how his weak and selfish success affected the women whom he met in his path. A clever little study of character, and thoroughly modern. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)

THE HOUSE BY THE LOCK. BY MRS. C. N. WILLIAMSON.

A melodramatic story by a writer who is becoming steadily popular among those who like melodramatic stories. (Bowden. 6s.)

MISS MALEVOLENT.

ANON.

This novel, by the author of The Hypocrite, appears to be another of the increasing number of stories about real people. The author says it is not, but we cannot read his description of Guy Waye and believe this denial. It palpitates, as the saying is, with actuality, and would seem to have been written largely under the influence of The Green Carnation. The wit is, however, inferior. "The Egyptian Hall," says Mr. World, "fascinates me; it enters into my life. Ever since I first went there I have had two servants—one Masculine and the other Cook." (Greening. 3s. 6d.)

THE DOCTOR.

BY H. DE VERE STACPOOLE.

The doctor was Dr. Townsend, a character in his way—"the most placid old man in the world, with a fearful temper." The story is of him and his niece, Indiana Thinville, who wrote a successful and audacious book, called Wists, under the pen name of John Sharpe. The doctor kept the book in his dressing-room beside his Bible. Mr. Stacpoole's tale is tragic, an odd mixture of real and conventional. (Unwin. 3s. 6d.)

MISS MARJORIE, OF SILVERMEAD. BY E. EVERETT-GREEN.

This is in every way a novel for young women, by a writer well accustomed to supply their needs. Miss Marjorie was Miss Marjorie Dacre, Aunt Marjorie, "the most delightful person in the world." Silvermead is also the most delightful place; and then for nearly four hundred crowded pages hearts are troubled and set right again, in an easy flow of narrative. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE WEIRD WELL.

BY MRS. ALEC McMILLAN.

"As the strains of the violins burst upon her ear, every dark and gloomy thought fled. In imagination she [Vera Polowski] was everything and nothing. She was in turn a spirit without a soul; a woman without pain. . . . Vera Polowski of stern reality ceased to exist. The Vera of musical imagination reigned supreme." This music was not at Bayreuth, nor at Covent Garden; it accompanied a three-and-sixpenny dinner at the Criterion. (Greening. 3s. 6d.)

HERONFORD.

BY S. R. KEIGHTLEY.

A romance of the Cassilis of Heronford. Family portraits, a family ghost, something of naval life, a secret marriage, a confession: such are a few of the elements of a picturesque and stirring story. The family scapegrace provokes his father to write: "A Cassilis might be mad, but he always went to the devil like a gentleman. He had never heard of any that had been hanged, but it seemed that his son was to bring the fashion into the family." (C. A. Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

JAMES COPE.

BY CUTHBERT BARMBY.

The autobiography of a villainous district attorney. "The fact that I was district attorney at twenty-five will be quite sufficient to prove to anyone who knows anything of Western American life that I was a very smart young man, which is what I want to prove." He proves it to the hilt. We like the scene in which Jimmy reminds the judge in a private interview: "We came to make a scoop, and you are pledged to it, and dare not contradict me." (Ward, Lock & Co. 3s. 6d.)

BLADE-O'-GRASS.

BY B. L. FARJEON.

A tale of mean streets, and of two twin girls, Ruth and Blade o' Grass. Blade o' Grass receives her name from her capture of a few growing blades of grass in Stoney-alley, when grass was rather scarcer than it is in Holborn. How the girls went through life is the story, told in a vivid, hackneyed style, which produces everywhere such phrases as "remorseless Time," "breathless expectation," &c. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

Miss Braddon.

An Enquiry.

THE great public is no fool. It is huge and simple and slow in mental processes, like a good-humoured giant; easy to please and grateful for diversion. But it has a keen sense of its own dignity; it will not be trifled with; it resents for ever the tongue in the cheek. When you address it you may turn aside your face to hide a smile; you may deceive it and continue to deceive it; but sooner or later—often sooner—the great mild-eyed public will awake to the disrespect. And then there is an end of you, for you are ignored. That is the only and sufficient punishment: the cut direct. This explains why many authors flourish and suddenly fade in the general esteem, though their work seems to a critical taste not to have worsened from its original mediocrity: they have been found out; the public is not mocked; and even now sundry glittering reputations are about to suffer extinction. It also explains why those popular authors who have never despised the public's shrewdness and dignity receive so great and permanent a reward. Among such authors to-day the foremost is Miss M. E. Braddon, affectionately known in a million homes as the contriver of Lady Audley's Secret. Miss Braddon is over sixty, she has written over sixty novels, and not once has she deviated from the narrow way of literary honesty; not once has she, by offering less than her best, presumed upon the fame of former successes. She has never been perfunctory, never spared her energies nor withheld her talent; she has given full measure and flowing over. And, while remembering the respect due to her tremendous patron, she has not forgotten that due to herself. Here is the foundation of her renown, which has been slowly built during a career of forty years. We are so accustomed to that renown that we may not, without consciously taking thought, realise its extent. Consider its universality, its uniqueness. It is a fact that there are thousands of tolerably educated English people who have never heard of Meredith, Hardy, Ibsen, Maeterlinck, Kipling, Barrie, Crockett; but you would travel far before you reached the zone where the name of Braddon failed of its recognition. Miss Braddon is part of England; she has woven herself into it; without her it would be different. This is no mere fanciful conceit. She is in the encyclopædias; she ought to be in the dictionaries, a common noun, for she stands for something which only schoolboys need ask to be defined.

So much for her position, in the national regard, to-day. To state the position is easier than to find the first cause of it in her books. Nevertheless that cause should be discoverable therein. One naturally turns to Lady Audley's Secret. Though this was not her first book, as is often supposed, it was her first, and perhaps her most brilliant, success. It appeared in 1862. Miss Braddon had been an acted playwright two years before that date, and she had also done novels. Lady Audley's Secret seems old-fashioned now. It refers to postillions and chariots, and Shoreditch Station (instead of Liverpool-street). The tone is often frankly religious. The hero always takes a pint of sherry to his dinner. The champagne is Cliquot instead of Veuve Cliquot. Despite these marks of time upon its outer garment, the essential vitality of the novel is not yet expended. Clearly it was written with a full pen, and it still lives: it is not dust. In 1862 the plot may or may not have been original; it has been used a thousand times since. But it is a plot admirably adapted for a broad and simple sensationalism. Take a young and beautiful woman, golden-haired, amiable, exquisitely feminine. Surround her with every circumstance of happiness—a wealthy middle-aged husband, who worships her innocent simplicity; a fine old English home; the universal adoration of dependents. Then lift the edge of the curtain of the past, disclosing behind it the monstrous shadow of a crime. Slowly raise the curtain and raise it, till the full history of this enchanting creature, who at twenty has begun life again, stands dreadfully clear. That, save for a couple of minor passions, is the whole of Lady Audley's Secret. In two respects the book differs strangely from the usual sensational novel. The reader is never stretched on the rack of curiosity. "My lady's" guilt, and the nature of her secret, are made transparent from the first; nor can the reader reasonably doubt that the missing man is safely alive somewhere. Again, the ending is not entirely happy, and such happiness as occurs is by no means insisted upon. The story leaves, indeed, an effect of slight melancholy, for, while the reader is ultimately compelled to pity Lady Audley, she is not spared from a horrible fate. The modern newspaper syndicate, with its "finger on the public pulse," might have accepted Lady Audley's Secret; but it would certainly have returned it to the author for the addition of mystery and a more complete final happiness. Why, then, it may be asked, did Lady Audley's Secret so abundantly conquer the public? The answer to the question is: Partly by the slow and various ingenuity by which the crime is laid bare and the criminal convicted, but more by reason of the fulness and sincerity of the book's inspiration. The young author meant every line of it intensely, and neither her invention nor her vision ever flags. She is fecund, opulent in a certain sort of imagination. Indeed, I should hesitate to deny to Miss Braddon the title of artist. When, with a mind hypersensitised to receive critical impressions, I read Lady Audley's Secret, my chief feeling was one of surprise at its level excellence, its honesty, its fine disdain of trade tricks. And I was astonished, too, at the sound vigour of the writing. Miss Braddon might have been a notable stylist had she chosen; she has the essence of the matter. Not infrequently she strikes the true lyric note:

"He will do it," she said, between her set teeth; "he will do it, unless I get him into a lunatic asylum first; or unless——"

She did not finish the thought in words. She did not even think out the sentence; but some new and unnatural pulse in her heart seemed to beat out each separate syllable against her will.

The thought was this: "He will do it, unless some strange calamity befalls him and silences him for ever." The red blood flashed up into my lady's face with as sudden and transient a blaze as the flickering flame of a fire, and died as suddenly away, leaving her paler than winter snow. Her hands, which had before been locked convulsively together, fell apart and dropped heavily at her sides. She stopped in her rapid pacing to and fro—stopped as Lot's wife may have stopped, after that fatal backward glance at the perishing city, with every pulse slackening, with every drop of blood congealing in her veins in the terrible process that was to transform her from a woman into a statue.

Lady Audley stood still for about five minutes in that strangely statuesque attitude, her head erect, her eyes staring straight before her—staring far beyond the narrow boundary of her chamber wall, into dark distances of visionary horror.

That is English. Wilkie Collins could not have done it; Hugh Conway could not have done it; nor, I dare to say, sundry greater men whom to name in this connexion would be to call forth a protest; nor any other living sensational writer. Staring far beyond the narrow boundary of her chamber wall, into dark distances of visionary horror! It is prose. It has the genuine vital impulse—the impulse which created The Duchess of Malfi, Wuthering Heights, and other masterpieces of dread.

Lady Audley's Secret is in Miss Braddon's early manner, and, though in some ways it remains unsurpassed by later work, she has developed in her middle and later periods a manner which is at once more elaborately skilful and more specially her own. In passing, I will point out that novels like Ishmael and London Pride, both historical, and of which the interest lies in character rather than event, stand apart from the body of her production. They are good novels, and more than a proof of versatility, but they are scarcely "Braddon." A good typical Braddon of the later period is Rough Justice, standing fifty-seventh in the catalogue of that uniform edition whose picture boards ornament the railway stations of three kingdoms. In the opening scene of Rough Justice Miss Braddon is precisely herself. The half gay, half melancholy bustle of the steamer's departure, and the unexpected joyous meeting of Arnold Wentworth and Mary Freeland, both young and alert and shrewd and clever and agreeable: these things, with the low-voiced hints of forgotten sins which will yet demand a penalty, are done with absolute precision of touch. Miss Braddon always likes her young characters, and she always paints them with a special verve. The whole chapter is steeped in the kindness, sagacity, and optimism which mark the author's temperament, and which constitute, apart from technical powers, the secret of her popularity. Miss Braddon is of those who have seen much, and have learnt charity therefrom. There is no narrowness in her. She has a heart which will contain the world; and she is aware of her world, she has studied it professionally for forty years. All has been fish that comes into the net of her memory. She is a Whiteley of actualities, and no matter what her story she can connect it closely with that which Mrs. Meynell has well called the "dailiness" of life. She knows. She knows the ways of prosecuting counsel at Bow-street, how lodgers bang doors, what game is shot in South Africa and the Dutch name of it and the name of the gun, how a ship leaves port, and how a guttersheet dies. This is another part of her attraction. She can take the morning paper and render it back again to the man in the street exquisitely transformed into something more agreeable, more gracious, and less disturbing. The man in the street reads Rough Justice, and says: "This is life, because I recognise the facts." And he is right in his way.

Rough Justice is a murder-mystery; Miss Braddon knows better now than to disclose her secret at the beginning. The interest of the tale turns on the detection of the murderer. At the start, of course, an innocent man is accused, but he is acquitted. It may be noted here that the concocter of crime-mysteries probably works backwards. Construct the actual crime and make it credible without being obvious; then construct a contemporaneous set of circumstances capable of offering an obvious solution, and disclose this first. The two chains of event need only touch at a single point; and that point is the Coincidence. The mystery-monger is entitled to one coincidence, not more. Miss Braddon seldom exceeds her allowance. Her constructions are full of ingenuity and resource. The retirement of the Inspector in Rough Justice is a piece of pure inspiration. It is necessary to observe particularly that Miss Braddon in her later books communicates the feeling of mystery not by means of atmosphere, but by means of contrasted facts plainly stated. There is fifty times more sense of mystery and apprehension in the night-picture of the crime on the cover than in the whole of the book itself. Miss Braddon, if I am not mistaken, abandoned early the machinery of "atmospheres," which she used so effectively in Lady Audley's Secret. She was doubtless drawn towards facts as she grew older. The development must have assisted her popularity, for the great public prefers the concrete to the vague and suggestive.

Prosper Merimée said that all the characters of Balzac, even the scullions, have genius. Similarly one may say that in all Miss Braddon's characters there is a certain quality of comfortableness; they do not irritate; whatever their vagaries, you know that a final appeal to their good sense and broad charity will not be in vain: there is something at the bottom of them. Miss Braddon has a vast embracing sympathy. Sin must be punished; the future must pay for the past; but, this being granted, let us have riches and bright tempers, and eat well and dress well, and live in glorious old mansions. The life of the English country house, with its luxurious solidity—with what unaffected satisfaction she describes it! Miss Braddon is human; she represents the best aspect of average humanity—that "ultimate decency" which resides somewhere in everyone. It is this quality which is the deepest root of her success. Probably she would not exchange it for the first-rate passionate imagination which she lacks, and which might have made her great.

E. A. B.

Travestying Herbert Spencer.

PROF. WARD is looked upon as the rising light of the Cambridge School of Psychology, and the publication, under the title of Naturalism and Agnosticism (A. & C. Black), of the Gifford lectures which he delivered before the University of Aberdeen, has been regarded in certain quarters as a "light to lighten the Gentiles" in the wilderness of scientific darkness. People who want a champion to buttress up their particular "ism," are usually satisfied with very light doses of fact and argument, and have a marked preference for misrepresentation, ridicule, and abuse, and Prof. Ward reaches high latitudes as a special pleader. That his book should be regarded as a notable one and a splendid specimen of Cambridge modes of thought, is startling evidence of the strength and vitality of the Damnosa haereditas of early evolutionary days. The Professor states that he has aimed at discussing, in a popular way, certain "assumptions of modern science" which have led to a more or less tacit rejection of idealistic views of the world, for until an idealistic (i.e., spiritualistic) view of the world can be sustained, any exposition of theism is but wasted labour. He accordingly sets himself resolutely to the task of getting the "assumptions of science" out of the way so as to make room for theism. He has much to say about Tyndall, Huxley, and Darwin, and other big and honoured names—albeit that he strangely misses the point of their teaching. For they laboured to make it plain that evolution, as they understood it and taught it, was neither theistic nor anti-theistic, and that though it collided with certain theological theories, it was utterly incapable of explaining everything in the universe. They merely robbed people of a number of bogus shares and false bank-notes, and Huxley stoutly maintained that mechanical and teleological views were not, when stripped of certain unnecessary encumbrances, mutually exclusive.

But Mr. Herbert Spencer is the central figure in Prof. Ward's book, and we are clearly given to understand that all will be well with theism if only that distinguished philosopher can be got out of the way, and safely confined to what has been called his completely deserted "desert island." Those who travesty Mr. Spencer's teaching have of late had much to say about this "desert island," but Prof. Ward only half believes in its existence, for to him the author of Synthetic Philosophy is a veritable "datum of consciousness," who, having launched his philosophic theory of evolution, cannot now be dismissed from the thoughts of men.

In assailing Mr. Spencer's philosophy Prof. Ward has much to say about physics and metaphysics, and he has a flourish of theory and parade of phrases which will doubtless make an impression on the uninitiated. But he keeps the general reader steadily in view, and in order to preserve the unflagging attention of that important individual he indulges freely in personalities and question-begging epithets. His telling points, or what he considers such, all tell in one direction—namely, that he is a violent partisan, and so strongly biased that his verdict is utterly worthless. A few specimens will be sufficient to prompt the very pertinent question: "How is it possible for a writer who is moved by the feelings implied to present the views of an antagonist in a fair manner?" He makes much of what he considers utter affectation in Mr. Spencer for using in certain instances initial capital letters. He makes the following quotation from Mr. Spencer's First Principles, noting in parenthesis his disapproval: "By the persistence of Force (capital F) we really mean the persistence of some Power (capital P) which transcends our knowledge and conception. The manifestations as recurring in ourselves, or outside ourselves, do not persist, but that which persists is the Unknown Cause (capital again) of these manifestations." But surely Prof. Ward is here allowing animus to prompt him to enter a very absurd caveat. For by condemning the use of capitals in the cases just cited he allows us to infer that while "James Ward" may fitly be honoured with capitals, and while a fictitious character like the notorious Bill Sikes may be similarly honoured, it is improper that capitals should be used in naming the agency of which all things are manifestations. Here an initial small letter only is, it seems, appropriate, but in suggesting his belief in that appropriateness the Professor only too palpably gives himself away. But in his zeal to discredit Mr. Spencer Prof. Ward has other weapons in store. He quotes a portion of a letter by Darwin to John Fiske, in which the author of the Origin states that "Such parts of H. Spencer as I have read with care impress my mind with the idea of his inexhaustible wealth of suggestion but never convince me," and Prof. Ward leaves his readers to infer that that was Darwin's first and last verdict about Spencer, than which nothing could be more unfair and even untrue. He might have remembered the appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober, and appealed from Darwin knowing little to Darwin knowing a great deal more. Had he done so he would have come across the memorable letter in which, addressing Spencer, Darwin states: "Everyone with eyes to see and ears to hear (the number, I fear, are not many) ought to bow the knee to you, and I for one do."

Then we are told that—

His [Spencer's] Synthetic Philosophy is made up of Hamilton's theory of the Unconditioned, of the physical theory of the conservation of energy, of the nebular hypothesis of Laplace, and of what used to be called the development hypothesis or the doctrine of the transmutation of species. The Darwinian form of this doctrine came too late to be satisfactorily incorporated in his system, still Mr. Spencer was not slow to turn it to account so far as he could.

This is simply "clotted nonsense," being an old piece of fiction with new and startling embellishments, which make one despair of "Cambridge modes of thought." But then fiction is such a useful weapon in controversy, and enables one to mount a chair and gesticulate with such marked effect that one is not surprised at the liberal use made of it by Prof. Ward.

But the great point in Prof. Ward's long indictment is what he calls the "missing two volumes," for the Professor has made the astounding discovery that the two volumes which ought to have been the base and bulwark of Synthetic Philosophy are wanting, and without them the whole fabric falls to the ground as a tissue of absurdities. We first hear of this momentous affair in the preface, and from the preface onward we are never allowed to forget the missing articles, for, like the borderneau in the Dreyfus case, everything hangs on them. Says the Professor in his preface: "Mr. Spencer has blandly to confess that two volumes of his Synthetic Philosophy are missing, the volumes that should connect inorganic and biological evolution." Such a statement simply disfigures Prof. Ward's book, and Cambridge modes of thought must be in a bad way when fustian like this requires to be resorted to. For the statement implies that Mr. Spencer deliberately skipped two volumes because he dared not attempt them, than which nothing could be more untrue. At the very start, in 1860, Mr. Spencer stated that the application of his "First Principles" to inorganic nature would be passed over, because his system was too extensive without it, and because it was of more importance to interpret organic nature. It was thought absurd, and even insane, for one man, an invalid, to undertake the work mapped out at the beginning; now Prof. Ward reproaches Mr. Spencer for not making the scheme quite impossible by making it still more extensive. Mr. Spencer began his vast system with broken health, and from first to last the great question with him was not lack of ability to work out his theory all round and adequately elucidate it, but the fear, the ever present fear, that his health would utterly give way under the strain. But he struggled on, and at seventy-six years of age he more than completed his system as regards the number of volumes promised, and he fully completed it as regards exposition of views. So that the Professor's great discovery never meant anything of any consequence at any time, and is utterly meaningless now. But the missing two volumes play such a great part in Prof. Ward's indictment that the Professor must be allowed to state his charge more fully. He says (vol. i., pp. 262-3):

To be sure, Mr. Spencer tells us, when hard pressed by critics, that of the Synthetic Philosophy two volumes are missing—the two important volumes on inorganic evolution. "The closing chapters of the second of these volumes," he continues, "were it written, would deal with the evolution of organic matter—the step preceding the evolution of living forms. Habitually carrying with me in thought the contents of this unwritten chapter, I have, in some cases, expressed myself as though the reader had it before him, and have thus rendered some of my statements liable to misconception." Surely this is a statement not wanting in humour or in pathos! Who is the more to be pitied—the sympathetic readers who, through no fault of their own, as Mr. Spencer allows, have misunderstood, lacking as they have done for thirty-six years these two missing volumes of the stereotyped philosophy, or poor Mr. Spencer himself, with these unwritten volumes in his teeming brain, compelled all that time to see his statements misconstrued?

To all which the obvious answer is, "Fiddlesticks!" "Sympathetic readers" could not possibly have misunderstood Mr. Spencer, the misunderstanding being entirely on the part of hostile unsympathetic readers—men of the Cambridge school of thought, who have always pinned to see Mr. Spencer dismissed into space. There was no waiting till hard pressed by critics to announce that two volumes were missing, the scheme of Synthetic Philosophy having been mapped out and detailed at the very beginning. Besides, inorganic evolution is not passed over, and there is nothing wanting. For—and this is what Prof. Ward altogether ignores—Mr. Spencer has, in his writings, told us all that is known about inorganic evolution, and, what is more to the point, he has told us all that need be known about inorganic evolution, for the purpose of elucidating his First Principles. He has demonstrated what, indeed, needs very little demonstration, that the earth having been once in a liquid state from excessive heat, there could then have been no living matter upon it; and that, consequently, non-living matter must have been turned into living matter in accordance with natural laws. And believing firmly in evolutionary generation, and not in spontaneous generation, he has fully explained how he conceives that, after a period of chemical evolution, inorganic became organic matter, and was moulded into the simplest types. But Prof. Ward is so thoroughly unscientific as to be always thinking about the moulding of matter straight away into a Senior Wrangler or a Smith Prizeman; and, of course, Mr. Spencer is naturally regarded by him as a mere spinner of words and phrases. One smiles at Prof. Ward saying that the spectacle of Mr. Spencer carrying in his teeming brain the contents of two unwritten volumes is somewhat humorous, for the only thing humorous about it is the fact that Prof. Ward considers it humorous. For in stating that he carried about in his mind the contents of an unwritten book Mr. Spencer is simply saying that he had thought out his subject; and Prof. Ward would have done well to have carried in his mind for some years these Gifford Lectures before committing them to book form.

Space does not permit, and indeed it is not necessary for me to deal with what Prof. Ward believes to be the heart of his book, namely, mind, and the hopelessness of Mr. Spencer's mechanical views to solve that riddle. The Professor's final resting-point is in spiritualistic monism, but in working up to his goal he relies much on those old bogies "dead matter," "blind agnosticism," and "mechanical necessity." It is all the old, old story, which has become somewhat stale to the thorough-going Spencerian, for Mr. Spencer has from first to last made it clear that he recognises that the transcendent problem which the universe presents is utterly beyond him, and that in acknowledging his incompetence to grasp in thought the cause of all things he is displaying true humility and reverence. His pride is purely mythical. Pride and arrogance are more applicable to Prof. Ward and those who, like him, profess to know and explain everything. But the Professor has in the end a "bland confession" of his own to make, for, after quoting Mr. Spencer's reverent dictum that the cause of all things is beyond us, and that it is strange that men should consider the highest worship to lie in assimilating this cause, this object of their worship, to themselves, he says: "For my part I feel that there is only too much in religious and theological literature to justify this censure." This is a startling confession for such a partisan critic to make, and the subsequent efforts made to minimise it and explain it away only emphasise the conviction that the author has imperfectly grasped the chain of reasoning he professes to demolish. And as he fails to grasp the chain of reasoning, he fails also to realise that the new methods of explaining instead of ridiculing forms of belief, and the larger charity and toleration which have supplanted the barren negations of bygone days, are largely if not entirely the work of the man he so strangely misrepresents and misunderstands—Herbert Spencer.

To Poseidon.

CONCERNING Poseidon, a great God, I begin to sing: the shaker of the land and of the sea unharvested; God of the deep who holdeth Helicon and wide Ægæe. A double meed of honour have the Gods given thee, O Shaker of the Earth, to be tamer of horses and saviour of ships. Hail Prince, thou Girdler of the Earth, thou dark-haired God, and with kindly heart, O blessed one, do thou befriend the mariners.

From "Homeric Hymns," translated into Prose by Andrew Lang. (George Allen.)

Things Seen.

Magnetism.

EVERY cranny, every corner of the huge building was filled. From arena, from balconies, from galleries eager faces peered towards the platform upon which a number of black-coated gentlemen sat stiffly. He who was speaking had a sonorous voice: his many words rolled through the hall and—left us cold. Another followed; the next was a statistician. The fourth was genial. The fifth wore his learning like a flower. The sixth was minatory, and all had their subject pat; they made everything clear—but they were dull.

Through all those unimpassioned words that huge audience sat inarticulate, unemotional, sated. And there seemed little chance of entertainment, for the hands of the clock were drawing near to eleven, and the rain of worthy speakers went on—on—on. One by one the people trickled out. It seemed as if the evening would pass without a single thrill. But when at a quarter-past eleven "the little man" sprang to his feet shouting "Stop!" to those who were leaving, and with one comprehensive gesture took that great audience into his confidence and proceeded to play on them like a musician on an instrument, everything was changed. They gave themselves to him. It was as if some great beast had suddenly roused itself, crept from its lair, and opened its eyes on life. The thousands awoke; they left their seats; they waved handkerchiefs; they shouted; speaker and audience became one. It was amazing—that transformation from apathy to enthusiasm, that sudden, hysterical awakening of sympathy between speaker and hearers. It was enkindling to see the handkerchiefs flashing, and to hear the roar of approval.

A Social Experiment.

OPPOSITE me was seated a lady in black, with a little girl daintily dressed in green with a large hat, white gloves on her small hands, and white socks reaching half-way up her little round legs. Round the bandstand four or five ragged but merry children were playing: they were dragging an old go-cart of home make about. Presently the little girl in green tugged the lady's arm several times. Then the lady rose and pretended that she wanted to sit on the seat nearest which the children were playing. At that moment one of them, a little dirty-cheeked girl, was sitting, her legs jutting out, on the high seat; she was of the same age as the child in green, but was "carried out in rags." The little patrician went up to her, smiled very prettily, and put out her white-gloved hand to the little scrub, who took it shyly, not knowing what to do with so dainty a thing; but the little lady did not "patronise," and they talked. Then it was evident that a game of "catch" had been proposed, for the ragged little one ran off round the bandstand, with white socks in pursuit. The chase was a stern one, but white socks was fleet, and not to dishearten the fugitive timed to catch her just on the post. Then white socks ran off with rags in chase. White socks ran gently at first, but just as her playmate was drawing near she spurted like a little hare, eyes sparkling, curls blowing. She romped home, and reaching the seat looked round panting. The guttersnipe was hopelessly in the rear, and her small dirty face was threatening a sob; under-lip was trembling, brows were bent. She never reached "home," but instead, stopped, turned slowly on her heel, and, running up to her bigger brother, took hold of his hand. So ended the experiment.

The Amateur Critic.

[FROM time to time we receive letters from correspondents in praise or disapproval of books new and old. In future, for awhile, we propose to put a page of the ACADEMY at the service of the unprofessional critic. To this page we also invite our readers to contribute remarks on striking or curious passages which they may meet with in their ordinary reading. No communication, we would point out, must exceed 300 words.]

Walter Pater.

Admirers of Walter Pater's work must, I think, have often felt the want of an edition of his books in a convenient form. Marius the Epicurean, for instance, would make a most delightful holiday companion if it were issued in volumes of the size of the "Golden Treasury" series. I will not say in that series, lest it be thought that I want to popularise Mr. Pater; but in its present form, in two bulky octavo volumes, it is a formidable addition to one's luggage, more especially to the luggage of the enlightened cyclist or walking tourist. But there is a greater need, perhaps, of a good selection from his works. Much as volumes of selections are abused, it is very convenient to have a shelf of such volumes at hand for odd moments of reading. One can now put on the shelf prose selections from Hazlitt, Landor, Carlyle, Cardinal Newman, Thackeray, Matthew Arnold, and Mr. Ruskin—what a valuable addition would be a selection from the writings of Walter Pater! It would be interesting to hear what your readers have to say on this subject, and to see what extracts they would include in such a selection. I should not, for my part, care for mere paragraphs and sentences; I would ask for a few selected essays, such as:

"Du Bellay" .....	from Renaissance Studies .
"Rossetti" .....	" Appreciations .
"Wordsworth" .....	" "
"An Essay on Style" .....	" "
"A Prince of Court Painters" ..	" Imaginary Portraits .
"The Child in the House" ...	" Macmillan's Magazine .
"Cupid and Psyche" .....	" Marius the Epicurean .
"Marcus Aurelius" .....	" "
"The Supper Party" .....	" "
"A Selection" .....	" Gaston de Latour .

"Like an Angel from a Cloud."

In Mr. Gosse's Life of Donne there are some capital pages about Donne as a preacher. It was said that he had no message "to clouted shoon"; but this was in an age when, as Mr. Gosse says, "he preached best who with most austere isolation rose above the crowd, and remained supreme and irreproachable." Mr. Gosse quotes the peroration of Donne's second Prebend Sermon delivered in St. Paul's on January 29, 1626. This is a superb specimen of a kind of preaching which is no longer heard, or even attempted. Donne's subject was the triumph over death. This is how he ended:

As my soul shall not go towards heaven, but go by heaven to heaven, to the heaven of heavens, so the true joy of a good soul in this world is the very joy of heaven; and we go thither, not that being without joy, we might have joy infused into us, but that, as Christ says, Our joy might be full, perfected, sealed with an everlastingness; for, as He promises, That no man shall take our joy from us, so neither shall death itself take it away, nor so much as interrupt it, or discontinue it, but as in the face of death, when he lays hold upon me, and in the face of the devil, when he attempts me, I shall see the face of God (for everything shall be a glass, to reflect God upon me), so in the agonies of death, in the anguish of that dissolution, in the sorrows of that valediction, in the inexpressibleness of that transmigration, I shall have a joy, which shall no more evaporate, than myself shall evaporate, a joy, that shall pass up, and put on a more glorious garment above, and be joy superinvested in glory. Amen.

Mr. Watson's Poems.

Opinions vary as to Mr. Watson's exact position among our poets; but there can be no doubt his place is a high one. To win a place in the foremost rank, a poet must either be able to delineate human nature in powerful, vigorous dramas, that fascinate the reader on account of the subtle analysis contained in them of the emotions and passions; or his soul must be ravished by the glory and the beauty of the world, and he must be able to express in majestic word-music the wonderful delight that he feels in the contemplation of nature.

Mr. Watson's chief claim to greatness consists in the fact that he possesses the second of the two gifts I have mentioned. He expresses his sense of the sublimity of nature in magnificent lyric outbursts of song, such as the "Ode in May" and "Hymn to the Sea." I should like to make some quotations here of considerable length, but space does not permit for more than this stanza from the former poem:

For of old the sun, our sire,
Came wooing the mother of men,
Earth, that was virginal then,
Vestal fire to his fire.
Silent her bosom and coy,
But the strong god sued and pressed;
And born of their starry nuptial joy
Are all that drink of her breast.

"Robinson Crusoe."

The other day, in an hour of unusual leisure, unusually vacant, I picked up my boy's copy of Robinson Crusoe, and read and read. I was a boy again. Alas, that it was only for an hour, and that since then I have been asking myself absurd adult questions about the book! However, boys do not read the ACADEMY, and behind their backs I would fain jot down a few thoughts. In what does the charm of Robinson Crusoe lie? Surely in a most singular and paradoxical economy of the two most necessary ingredients of great stories—truth to nature and literary art.

Defoe's economy of truth to nature is apparent when we consider what the real fate of a man must have been who for fifteen years lived alone on a desert island. He might adopt Crusoe's cheerful contrivances at first, but he would soon forget human speech, eat grass like Nebuchadnezzar, and decline into savagery or madness. Yet his situation is represented by Defoe as almost cheerful. As someone has said, Crusoe's long stay on the island produced in him only such mental suffering as might be due to a dull Sunday in Scotland. Defoe shows a like indifference to the artistic possibilities of the story. Charles Dickens marvelled that in all its pages there is nothing to make a man laugh or cry. If we consider what effects of humour or tragedy Dickens himself would have offered, or what a pile of philosophy Goethe would have dumped on Crusoe's foreshore, or what spectral and intolerable horrors Poe would have raised from that ocean prison, we shall see that Defoe's success—which is unchallenged—was won by a narrower set of powers than has gone to the making of any piece of fiction comparable to Robinson Crusoe in merit and fame.

Defoe, in fact, brought to his story little more than his wonderful circumstantial invention; and he was so little of an artist that he did not see that the story ends when Crusoe leaves his island and returns to England. But the tale thrives on its limitations. Men have cheerfully accepted a novel of human contrivance and homely wisdom in place of a novel of psychological insight and lofty tragedy. As for my boy, he would not barter a single passage from the Wreck, for all that a committee of novelists could add of poetry, or sentiment, or climax.

Memoirs of the Moment.

CARDINAL RICHELIEU and President Kruger! The association may seem far to seek. Yet President Kruger is, by his marriage, actually connected with the great Cardinal, whose name, as everyone knows, was Du Plessis. Kruger was a young man when he met and married a member of the Du Plessis family, the descendant of a French surgeon (the near relative of the Cardinal) who went to the Cape in the seventeenth century in the employment of the Dutch East India Company. An early death speedily deprived the President of his first wife, who was immediately followed to the grave by her only son. A little later he chose a second wife from the same family. The second Mrs. Kruger was, in fact, the niece of the first, the Dopper creed not disallowing marriages within these degrees of consanguinity. It was apropos of this marriage that General Joubert, who at one time had a keen dislike of President Kruger, made a jest in his imperfect English. The President, he said, was a man of "double du-plessity." By his second and still reigning wife, the President is the father of sixteen children.

I AM not at the moment aware of the first mention of "Dutch courage" in our literature. Perhaps the phrase comes merely from the habit of drinking Hollands, known of old among our own soldiers, before going into action. But the ironical allusion it has come to have to the courage of the Dutch has no place in history. From this week this phrase, as an imputer of cowardice to the Dutch, ought, one supposes, to be extinct.

OF Mr. Horatio Tennyson, whose death passes almost unnoted, there is little to be said, except that he was the youngest of the poet's company of brothers. His life was one of some difficulty from the beginning. He, too, had a temperament. When his time at South School was over he loitered and moped at Somersby, a good subject, as it seemed, for nothing in particular. His powers were not deficient, but he never opened a book. He read nature pretty well though, and his observation of men and women—the few he had met—was so penetrating that his brother Alfred begged him to go to his friend Tennant at Blackheath; whither he went accordingly. The next thing was that he wanted to enlist. The suggestion was a grief to his mother, and the lad was sent instead to try his fortune in Tasmania. The story of many a younger son in a large family was his—a somewhat sad one, where the mother outlives the father and has small means. Horatio Tennyson was to have a long life, if it was not a very merry one. Religion, as expressed by the Oxford Movement, caught him and held him tight. He felt the matter too much to be able to talk it over without too much heat with the Poet, between whom and himself, however, friendly, if intermittent, relations were always maintained, as many a visitor to the Poet in his later years who met Horatio at Aldworth will remember. In earlier days, too, he often visited Farringford. Lady Taylor used to tell the story of going into a room there one afternoon in dim light, and seeing a figure stretched at length upon a sofa. She addressed herself as to the Poet, but a correcting voice from the cushions came forth: "I'm Horatio, the most morbid of the Tennysons!"

LADY CLIFFORD, whose death took place in Cornwall-gardens, South Kensington, the other day, and who had reached the age of eighty, was a woman of decision. When she was Miss Hercy she accepted the suit of Mr. Charles Clifford—a tall suitor, by the way, for a girl whose height was that of Queen Victoria, whom in later years she somewhat resembled otherwise as she drove in the Park. Mr. Clifford was the cadet of an ancient Roman Catholic family, who, having secured the promise of the lady of his choice, decided to seek for fortune in the Colonies. To New Zealand he went, with results which are pretty well known. His political life there ended in his being Speaker of the House of Representatives; but his own private, proudest boast in reference to his New Zealand career was that he had imported the first trout that were put into New Zealand waters, for the benefit of all future generations.

BEFORE his successes in New Zealand as politician and as land-owner, young Clifford had a time of suspense, during which he wrote home to the lady he had left behind him to tell her that he could not ask her to wait indefinitely, and to wish her happiness in her freedom. He waited her answer with anxiety: the mail came; and with it the lady herself. The marriage that at once signalled her courage was one of the happiest on record; and Sir Charles Clifford lived for some years to enjoy and to spend in London and at a country house in the Midlands the great wealth that came to him from his property in New Zealand. He was made a baronet in 1887, and was happy in his dignity. Yet it often seemed as if his old colonial habits and feelings had a predominant place in his affections. The last public meeting at which he spoke was one in connexion with a memorial to Cardinal Manning. There was a certain pathos in the old man's references throughout to the Archbishop of Westminster as the Archbishop of Wellington, the town of the Roman Catholic primacy in New Zealand.

THE enlargement of Hughenden Manor is, no doubt, the natural, if not the inevitable, consequence of the marriage of Mr. Coningsby Disraeli. Yet one regrets that the modesty of the mansion in which the grandiose statesman spent his happiest hours is lost thereby. He himself, man of contrasts as he was, loved the littleness of the place. All the greatness was in the associations, and particularly in that visit paid to him there by the Queen—a visit to which the greatest houses in Bucks could not aspire. If you cannot rival Stowe, and if you must be proud of something, you may as well put your pride in the very narrowness of your domain. Lord Beaconsfield did this with particular success. "Excuse the vanity of a landed proprietor," he used to say when he showed his few fields to men who owned immense territories. Hughenden will become more commonplace as it becomes more prosperous.

"GRADUALLY the wind freshened and veered until at west-south-west it was blowing a strong steady breeze, and, with all square-sail set, the old Harrowby was bowling along at a good eight knots for the Channel. Faithful as usual, this well-beloved wind to the homeward-bounder never relaxed its strenuous push until the changing hue of the water, plain for all men to see, told us that we were once more on the soundings. Oh, blessed sight, that never falls upon the deep-water sailor, the fading away of that deep fathomless blue which for so many, many weary watches has greeted the eye! Somehow or other, too, the green of the Channel of Old England has a different tint to any other sea-green. It is not a pretty colour, will not for a moment bear comparison with the blazing emerald of some tropical shores, but it looks welcome—it says home; and even the most homeless and hardened of shell-backs feels a deep complacency when it greets his usually unobservant eye."—From Frank T. Bullen's "The Log of a Sea-Waif."

Correspondence.

"The Howling Cheese."

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. F. W. Morris, draws attention to R. L. Stevenson's praise of Herman Melville's works, and deploras the fact of his books being strangely inaccessible. He suggests a sixpenny edition, which possibly might pay some enterprising publisher. Meantime, I may say that Types can hardly be termed "inaccessible," as it is included in an admirable series of books called "The Sea Library," published by W. H. White & Co., Ltd., Edinburgh and London. Types was issued only last year. The series includes Darwin's Voyage and that rare sea story by George Cupples, The Green Hand. The books are beautifully got up, and are excellent value at the money, 3s. and 3s. 6d., according to the bulk of the volume.

May I be allowed to add that the Amateur Critic column is a happy thought on the part of the editor, and is sure to give pleasure and profit to all your readers?—I am, &c., Glasgow: October 9, 1899. G. LINWOOD.

Omar Khayyám.

SIR,—The statement of an "American Omanián," quoted in your last issue, that the name "Omar" should be accented on the last syllable, contains just enough truth to be misleading. In the first place, it is by no means certain that "all Persian words" are accented upon the final syllable. According to Dr. Trumpp, who has written an exhaustive treatise upon the difficult subject of Persian accent, the final stress is confined to parts of Persia; in the second place, the name Omar is not Persian, but Arabic, and all Arabs accent it upon the first syllable. Just as the Parisian pronunciation of a French name would be understood by the educated all over Europe, whereas if anglicised it would be unintelligible out of our own country, and "bad form" in that, so this Arabic accentuation of the name Omar will not only pass muster anywhere in the East, but will everywhere, even in Persia, be looked upon as more refined than the local mispronunciation. As to Khayyám, of course the final accent is correct, whether in Arabic, Persian, or any other language.—I am, &c., JAMES PLATT, JUN.

London: October 9, 1899.

SIR,—In your issue of the 7th inst., in one of the paragraphs under the head of "The Literary Week," you note that an American "Omanián" would correct the ordinary pronunciation of the name "Omar" to "Umar." As far as the first syllable is concerned he is right; but there is, in fact, no second syllable in the word at all, the name really being 'Umr, with no vowel between the "m" and the "r." In your suggested division between sheep and goats those would certainly be the sheep who said "'Umr," while the goats would be those who called him "'Umar." Moreover, it is by no means the case that in almost all Persian words the accent, or stress, is on the second syllable. I could give you numberless words in which the contrary is the case, the stress depending more than anything else on the length (long or short) of the vowels in the syllables respectively, but not entirely on that even. For instance, in the word shakhsi, "a certain person," the accent is on the first, although its vowel "a" is short and that of the second, "i," is long.—I am, &c.,

A. ROGERS (late Bombay Civil Service).

"The Manifold Uses of the Adverb."

SIR,—I am afraid I must incur the contempt of "Simplicity Severe" and try and live it down, as I confess myself an admirer of the "Split Infinitive." I have never found any of the purists who could give a logical reason for splitting the indicative and refusing to split the infinitive.

In my youth I learned in my catechism to say: "And I heartily thank my Heavenly Father." Why may I not now say my catechism taught me to heartily thank, &c., &c.?

Your correspondent lays down a rule that the proper place for the adverb is immediately after the verb. Is it? Let him try to arrange the following well-known line on his principle, and allow your readers to judge whether he has improved it:

"Slowly and sadly we laid him down."

Then he talks about the preposition at the end of the sentence being abolished; or, as he puts it, "done away with"! What is with?

The fact is, sir, that living languages cannot be tied up in the swaddling-clothes of grammatical rules, and speakers and writers will put adverbs where they are forcible, and that place, in many cases, is certainly not immediately after the verb. Does he generally say: "The father struck cruelly his son," instead of putting the adverb before the verb or after the object? Is he careful to say: "Whence do you come," instead of "where do you come from"? If so, I am sure he must afford to his friends considerable amusement.—I am, &c., J. W. K.

SIR,—"Simplicity Severe" writes in this week's ACADEMY that words "fail to adequately describe" his contempt for all who indulge in the pernicious practice of splitting infinitives.

The words I have quoted contain a split infinitive.

Is "Simplicity Severe" a humorist?—I am, &c.,

October 9, 1899.

EDGAR TURNER.

[Mr. Turner is certainly not a humorist if part of the equipment of a humorist be to discern humour in others.]

Misconceptions.

SIR,—Yet another bear story. My ten-year-old school-boy, preparing his lessons beside me one winter evening, asked what "lugging" meant.

I inquired the context.

"It's something bears do in a very cold country Mr. — was reading to us about to-day. It was a rather queer bit of poetry, and he read it because he said it was such a good description of winter."

The line that he remembered and thought queerest was:

When tom-bears lug into the hall.

Which was what Mr. — had seemed to say, the real line, of course, being

When Tom bears logs into the hall.

—I am, &c.,

J. M. S. M.

SIR,—Your correspondence on the above has caused my thoughts to wing their way back over several decades. In imagination, I see myself as a child repeating the words of the Lord's Prayer as I understand them to fall from my mother's lips: "Our Father, shorten heaven." I was much exercised over this phrase as I grew older, but it was not till I could spell out the words in the Prayer Book that I learnt differently.—I am, &c., G. A. E.

"The Little Panjandrum's Dodo."

SIR,—In the current number of the ACADEMY you give Mr. Farrow's new book, The Little Panjandrum's Dodo, as published by the S.P.C.K.

Will you kindly correct this mistake, as it will be issued this week by—Your, &c., SKEFFINGTON & SON.

Our Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 3.

LAST week we printed, by way of supplement, a large number of publishers' announcements of the forthcoming season, and we asked our readers to pick from those what, in their opinion, promise to be (a) the two most interesting biographies, (b) the two most interesting works of history, (c) the two most interesting works of travel, (d) the two most interesting religious works, (e) the two most interesting novels, and (f) the two most interesting books for children.

A collation of the replies received show that the consensus of opinion is that the two biographies that promise most interest are :

The Life of Thomas Henry Huxley. By Leonard Huxley.
The Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson.* Edited by S. Colvin.

The two historical works that promise most interest are :

Lord Acton's General History of Modern Times.
Mr. Lang's History of Scotland.

The two works of travel that promise most interest are :

The Highest Andes. By E. A. FitzGerald.
In India. By G. W. Steevens.

The two religious works that promise most interest are :

The Encyclopedia Biblica.
Jowett's Doctrinal Sermons.

The two novels that promise most interest are :

Stalky & Co. By Rudyard Kipling.
Robert Orange. By John Oliver Hobbes.

And the two children's books that promise most interest are :

Mr. Lang's Red Book of Animal Stories.
Mr. Walter Crane's Blue Beard's Picture-Book.

One list contains as many as nine of these books, and this has been sent in by Mr. David Stott, 25, Westbourne-terrace-road, W., to whom, therefore, a cheque for a guinea has been sent. Mr. Stott's remaining three selections are Mr. Gosse's Life and Letters of Donne; Church and Faith: Essays on the Teaching of the Church of England; and Miss Upton's Gullivog in War.

Competition No. 4. (New Series.)

"Urbanus Sylvan," writing in the October Cornhill of his adventures by the summer sea, describes the poverty of the bookshelves in his rooms ; and incidentally, referring to country inn libraries generally, suggests that the ACADEMY should ask its readers to name the best books for an inn to keep. The idea is a good one, and we offer a prize of a guinea to the best list of twenty books to stand on the shelves of a country inn. In this case we shall ourselves decide as to the winner, abandoning judgment by consensus of opinion.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, October 17. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the third column of p. 440 or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given : we cannot consider anonymous answers.

* Our contributor includes this with biography. But the work of biography proper which receives most votes is The Life of Sir John Millais.

"LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE"

Issued by "The Standard," and Edited by Dr. RICHARD GARNETT, C.B. (late Keeper of Printed Books at the British Museum),
In association with (for France) M. LEON VALLEE, Librarian of the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris; (for Germany) Dr. ALOIS BRANDL, Prof. of Literature in the Royal University, Berlin; (for America) DONALD G. MITCHELL (Ik Marvel), the Author of "Reveries of a Bachelor," New York.

SOME OF THE MANY NOTABLE FEATURES

"LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE."

AN UNPARALLELED COLLECTION.—The Library of Famous Literature is a collection, unparalleled in extent of the greater literature of the world, from the dawn of letters, through Ancient and Medieval times, to the work of living authors like Ruskin, Tolstol, Mommsen, Hardy, Herbert Spencer, Ibsen, Mark Twain, Swinburne, and Kipling.

ITS EDITORS.—It has been prepared by the most competent hands, by men whose life-work has been a development of that keen judgment and critical insight necessary for the production of such a Library. The Editor of the English edition is Dr. Richard Garnett, C.B., equally known for his fifty years of service in the British Museum and as one of the foremost of English scholars. The association of Professor Brandl, Professor of Literature in the Royal University, Berlin, of M. Léon Vallee, Librarian of the famous Bibliothèque Nationale of Paris, and of Donald G. Mitchell, of the United States, not to speak of many qualified assistants, suffices to stamp the work as of the highest authority.

COMPLETE AND NEW.—It is an absolutely new and original work, the first complete collection of the world's literature published in Great Britain. Its mere extent is equalled only by great works of reference like the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

WHAT ITS TWENTY VOLUMES CONTAIN.—Its contents are as varied as literature itself, and its scope continuous with that of the world of letters. It includes over 300 of the finest poems, over 400 of the best stories, together with the best of travel and adventure, philosophy and science, art, wit and humour, letters and journals, religious meditation, criticism, and miscellaneous essays which may be gathered from all the books still preserved among men.

OVER 10,000 ROYAL OCTAVO PAGES.—The Library comprises over 10,000 royal octavo pages, of large, clear type cast specially for the Library, and restful to the most sensitive eyes.

DELIGHTFUL TO READ.—The work is complete in twenty handsome volumes, printed upon a paper made especially for this work, presenting a clear, soft, unglazed surface, rendering these books so light that they may be held with the utmost ease.

ILLUSTRATIONS THAT ARE INTERESTING.—The Library is richly embellished with nearly 500 full-page illustrations and coloured plates, printed separately from the text, on heavy enamelled paper. These illustrations include portraits of all the most famous authors who ever lived; a delightful series of pictures of famous houses, and a still more novel series of famous authors in their homes, seated by their study tables, amid their books, at work. So, too, their haunts are shown, the scenes of memorable passages in their books, and places celebrated in literature or in history.

RARE COLOURED PLATES.—The coloured plates, running in each volume, form one of the most notable features of the Library. They have been gathered from rare sources, and comprise some of the most exquisite specimens of the antique art of book-illumination.

A GREAT LIBRARY IN ITSELF.—A thousand volumes could not contain all that one may find in the Library of Famous Literature—not many thousand, such as the average man or woman would buy, if they set out to purchase a huge library of the world's literature. All these treasures are here in the most compact and convenient form, arranged in chronological order to show the gradual development of the human intellect and the art of literature. They have been selected by the most competent hands, men who have spent their lives delving in books, and have here, as it were, brought up from the depths a vast treasury of pearls and sunken gold; masterpieces which are imperishable, others that have been forgotten and lost to view in the overwhelming flood which threatens to sweep from the library and bookshelf all but the ephemeral production of the hour.

We recommend the bindings in Half Persian Calf, and especially the Three-Quarter Red Levant, on account of their durability and handsome appearance and relative cheapness. The Red Levant is a particularly desirable and artistic form of the work. For those who desire the finest bindings, the sumptuous Full Morocco will be found to meet every requirement.

THE EDITOR OF THE LIBRARY, Dr. Richard Garnett, C.B., whose wide stores of learning are at the command of a graceful pen, contributes a strong and stimulating paper on The Use and Value of Anthologies.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN'S SELECTED LIST.

An Important New Work of Travel and Adventure.

IN DWARF-LAND AND CANNIBAL COUNTRY:

A Record of Travel and Discovery in Central Africa.

By ALBERT B. LLOYD.

With a Preface by Sir JOHN KENNAWAY, BART.

With 3 Maps, and over 150 Illustrations.
Cloth, 21s. net.

This is the account of an exciting journey across Africa from East to West, the last ten weeks being made in the autumn of '90. The Great Pygmy Forest, and the wonderful hot springs of Ruwenzori lay in his route from Uganda to the Atlantic. Mr. Lloyd made friends with the Pygmies, and stayed some time with them.

SOME NEW VOLUMES IN UNWIN'S GREEN CLOTH LIBRARY.

THE DOCTOR. By H. De Vere
STACPOOLE. Cloth, 6s.

FIRST REVIEWS.

"If the Doctor himself is a creation, then Mr. Stacpoole is as great a creator as Thackeray.... The book is excellently written."—Scotsman.

"A very good book, quiet, well-written, and sincerely felt."

Outlook.

AS OTHERS SEE US. By WATSON DYKE, Author of "Craiktrees," &c.
Cloth, 6s.

Miss Austen was fond of depicting the impulsive girl who acted on the spur of the moment and jumped to romantic conclusions. Such a character—set as a governess in a typical seaside boarding-school—is the heroine of this novel. She becomes the centre of disapproving attention on the part of her employers and their children. But her heroic and well-meant audacity culminates when she makes a public appearance at an itinerant musician's entertainment. Miss Dyke will be found to have made good use of the fun and pathos suggested by her plots.

A NEW NOVEL, by the Author of "Moonlight."
THE PATTEN EXPERIMENT.

By MARY E. MANN. Cloth, 6s.

"Is a veritable oasis of delicious greenery in the weary desert of novels with a purpose, detective novels and novels of adventure."—Spectator.

"Susanah" is still probably Mrs. Mann's most substantial performance, but "Moonlight" and her most recent book,
"The Patten Experiment," show equal cleverness and even an advance in artistic dexterity."—Bookman.

A NEW BOOK FOR CHILDREN.
THE TREASURE SEEKERS. By
E. NESBIT. Fully illustrated by Gordon Browne and Lewis Baunor. In decorated cover, cloth, 6s.

NOTE.—An edition of this book is also published in Unwin's
Green Cloth Library at 6s.
In this book we have depicted the life of a family of children told by themselves in a candid, ingenuous, and very amusing style. On its original appearance in detached form Mrs. Nesbit received so many letters from children imploring for "the stories of the Bastable boys and girls in a book," that it was decided to reprint the tale.

A RACE OF FIGHTING MEN.

of FORTUNE. By KATHLEEN SHERVIN-
TON. Illustrated. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

This is the life-story of three soldier brothers, told as nearly as possible in their own words from their letters home. All three served in the early wars in South Africa. One of them died while still young, and of the remaining two one devoted his energies to Madagascar, and the other to Central America.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HOW TO BE HAPPY THOUGH MARRIED."

E. J. HARDY, M.A. Being the Donellan Lectures for 1898-9. With supplementary Chapters.

have rendered a service to the nation by compiling—obviously at great pains, industry, and research—this admirable biography of Arthur Phillip."—Full Mail Gazette.

THE SOCIAL LIFE of SCOTLAND in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

By the Rev. H. GREY GRAHAM.

"We can pay the author of these two volumes no higher compliment than by saying that unless we are much mistaken, they will rank as a classic contribution to the history of Scotland."—The Daily Chronicle.
"His picture of the domestic life and industry, the rural economy, the religious customs and theological opinions, the superstitions, the laws, and the educational institutions of the age of our great grandfathers is as vivid in colouring and effective in grouping and composition as it is authentic and trustworthy as a piece of history."—The Scotsman.

The Literary Week.

THERE is, of course, pessimistic talk about the effect of the Transvaal War on the reading of new books. We believe that the fears expressed in some quarters are artificial. Hardly had the Boer ultimatum been delivered than there were rumours that important books were to be held over indefinitely. Such withdrawals must have their effect. The public naturally acquiesces in the notion that they do not want to read books in war-time. To proclaim a panic is to cause it. But, meanwhile, we hear of books being sent out to the Transvaal in large quantities for British officers to read in camp. The moral is obvious. True readers are constant to their books. We do not go so far as to suggest that they are like the bibliophile, who, when he met a man who had just returned from the battlefield of Sedan in 1870, said: "That's very interesting; the first edition of Nonnius Marcellus was published at Sedan"; but we do hold that reading should not be at the mercy of public events.

WRITING in the new North American Review on the present literary situation in France, Mr. Henry James refers thus to M. Zola, whose Fécondité is already in its forty-seventh thousand: "The great historians are dead—the last of them went with Rénan; the great critics are dead—the last of them went with Taine; the great dramatists are dead—the last of them went with Dumas; and of the novelists of the striking group originally fathered by the Second Empire, Emile Zola is the only one still happily erect. . . . To arrive—as he has arrived—at the goal he began with fixing, M. Zola had to make art his special economy—see it steadily and see it whole. He has seen, moreover, many things besides; not the individual soul, the individual life, perhaps, with any great intimacy—never, indeed, with an inspired penetration; but always, vividly, its happy mean, or general average, of sense; its associated, confounded, scarce discriminate state." Fécondité is about to be published in England under the title Fruitfulness.

THE project, hinted at in Sir Michael Foster's presidential address at the British Association meeting in September, of an International Science Congress at the Paris Exhibition has been taken up by a committee which numbers some of the most able men of science in this country. Already it has got so far that general and special expository lectures, with expert guidance through the various departments of the Exhibition, are being arranged—these both in French and English—together with excursions, &c., broadly corresponding to the well-known features of a British Association programme. The acting secretaries are Profs. Mavor and Geddes, 5, Old Queen-street, S.W., and 95, Boulevard St. Michel, Paris.

THE fifteenth edition of Men of the Time will be published this year. We are reminded that whereas the original Men of the Time, in 1852, was a little book of four hundred pages, it will run, in its new form, to thirteen hundred pages, and contain three thousand three hundred and ninety-three biographies. This does not necessarily mean that there are more celebrated people to-day than there were in 1852. It might equally well mean that the standard of efficiency has lowered, or that more people are inquisitive about their fellows.

MR. DUNNE's forthcoming work, Mr. Dooley in the Hearts of His Countrymen, will be found to have a piquant dedication. Mr. Dunne is an Irishman, and Irishmen have a way of hitting back. If certain gentlemen, including a baronet of the realm, who pirated the first Dooley book find themselves mentioned there, they need not be surprised. Mr. Dooley's articles on the Dreyfus Court Martial will be found in the book. "I don't believe," said Mr. Dooley in Monday's Westminster Gazette, "that Cap Dhryfuss wrote the bordereau. I believe he was the only man in France who didn't"—a statement in which the philosopher's extravagant humour is crystallised.

A NEFARIOUS project for taking advantage of the absence of international copyright has just been exposed by the chairman of the Society of Authors. It seems that there exists in New York a concern, known as the Associated International Press, for trafficking in the early writings of Mr. Kipling. The Associated International Press, presuming on Mr. Kipling's popularity and want of protection, has collected together eighty-one of his effusions, some of them dating back to his boyhood, others belonging to his journalistic career in India, and all being such as he would not reprint himself, and, without a word to the author on the matter, is offering them for serial publication in American papers.

"ROMANCE brought up the 8.15"; and there is more than a touch of romance about the Daily Mail's announcement of its War Train, which at a speed of eighty miles an hour carries the Daily Mail from London to the North every morning via Leicester, Nottingham, Sheffield, and Manchester. The line chosen is the Great Central. This passage in Messrs. Harmsworth's circular we particularly like: "The train will be known as the Daily Mail War Express, and will consist of the fastest railway engine in the United Kingdom, and four newspaper vans. The most famous living engine-driver will be in charge." The "most famous living driver," the "War Express," and a speed of eighty miles an hour—there's romance for you. The enterprise is noble, although it is not as if Manchester and the other towns have not papers of their own, fed plentifully by Reuter and the other agencies. In the old war days, when news went by coach, it was news indeed.

MEANWHILE, we may remark that for a long time the Manchester Courier—itself an excellent paper, also having its own correspondent in the Transvaal—has been reaching us by express train. It may easily be conceived that a moment will arrive when London's zeal to inform Manchester and Manchester's to inform London will synchronise. Two War Expresses will approach each other at a combined rate of 160 miles an hour and, under pressure of journalistic and patriotic fervour, on the same set of rails. On the following morning, what peace!

MR. WILLIAM WATSON'S letter to the Daily Chronicle, on war poetry in general, and Mr. Swinburne's sonnet in particular, contains sound criticism. "Let us remember," he says, "that the existence of a great theme, not less certainly than of a great poet, is one of the indispensable antecedent conditions of great poetry. The assassination of a State, and the strangling of a people, are not heroic themes, and never while this world endures shall they evoke one note of noble song. Moreover, in all combats between a giant and a stripling the Muse must of necessity be at a certain moral disadvantage in the somewhat ludicrous task of enheartening the giant. It is the valour of David with his sling, and not the arrogant bulk of Goliath, that kindles the imagination of poets, and captures for ever the sympathies of man."

THE Tivoli, and not the Times, it has been remarked, is the place for patriotic verse. On occasion, however, a poet may supply both publics. Mr. Swinburne's sonnet is now being recited night by night at one of the halls of variety.

WITHIN the last few days a memorial monument to Helen Faucit (Lady Martin) has been placed in Llantysilio Church, in the Vale of Llangollen, where Lady Martin died on October 31 of last year. The monument consists of an alto-relievo, designed by the late J. H. Foley, and reproduced in white marble by Mr. J. Hughes, of Dublin. On the pedestal on which the alto-relievo rests is the following inscription:

In memory of Helena Faucit (Lady Martin), who died at Llantysilio 31st October, 1898.

"Her gracious genius belonged to the world. The charm of her goodness was for her home and for those who loved her."

This passage is by Mrs. Richmond Ritchie, and is taken from one of her introductions to the biographical edition of Thackeray.

In the Autobiography of Dean Merivale, with selections from his correspondence, which his daughter has just edited for public circulation, the letter in which the historian of Rome alleged that Louis Napoleon's coup d'état was borrowed from the History of the Romans is again given. This is the letter:

CHARLES MERIVALE TO HIS SISTER LOUISA.

Lawford: December 6, 1851.

I have come, no matter how, into possession of a piece of secret history, which will be curious hereafter. It seems that when Louis Napoleon saw the first advertisement of my vol. iii., he caused one of Spottiswoode's printers to be bribed, and got the sheets read off to him by submarine telegraph as fast as they were printed here. As soon as he came to the passage in Chapter 4, where Octavius claims the consulship by means of his army, he formed his plans with secrecy and decision. He saw that Cavaignac was just such another pedant as Brutus, and Changarnier a blusterer like Cassius. Thiers he remarked was just such a liar and spouter as Cicero. And so, with the help of his Agrippa, Arnaud, he arranged his coup d'état and issued his lists of proscription. I hope the Times comes to you regularly now; but if not you have only to read my book, where the events of the next ten years are compendiously related. I expect the young Octavius to buy a thousand copies for his regimental libraries, and I hope he will send me the Cross of the Legion of Honour for saying that in the circumstances of his position I should have done what he has done myself.

Some people have assumed that the Dean was in earnest, but he was of course only joking, as his daughter now shows. The joke was too good a one to lead to serious misapprehension; but no joke is safe.

BROTHER JOE.

[Mr. Kipling has recently joined an Edinburgh Masonic Lodge. His style there is Brother Joseph Rudyard Kipling.—Daily Papers.]

I CHANCED to be at Rottingdean upon a little trip;
I met a fellow Mason there and gave the man the grip;
"What ho," I said, "my Rudyard!" But his look was cold as snow:
"My name, you ought to understand," he said, "is Brother Joe."

O it's Rudyard this, and Kipling that, with poems, tales, and such,
And Rudyard Kipling is a name that can't be known too much.
O it's Rudyard this, and Kipling that, with any writing dodge,
But it's Brother Joseph Kipling when he joins a blooming Lodge.

I went into a library to get a book to read,
The man behind the counter asked: "What is it, sir, you need?"
"I want," I said, "the latest thing that Joseph Kipling's done."
"Go on," he said, "you're having me. Joe Kip? there isn't one!"

O it's Brother Joe, and Joseph, when insignias are out
And knives and forks are busy and the bottle goes about.
It's "Brother Joe from India" where'er the Masons throng,
But it's Rudyard Kipling only, when he writes a blooming song.

A good little inexpensive monograph on William Morris, which ought to be on sale in the Arts and Crafts Exhibition, has just been published from the office of the Peterhead Sentinel and the Twentieth Century Press, in London. It is entitled William Morris, Master of Many Crafts, and is from the pen of Mr. James Leatham. We quote a passage touching Morris's appearance :

He has been compared to one of his own Berserkers ; but I am not sure that any of us has a very clear idea of what a Berserker was like. The massive, shaggy head, the face strong and well-coloured, and the sailor-like roll of the body suggested a skipper ashore while his cargo was being discharged ; but then no skipper ever wore an Inverness cloak, or broad-brimmed felt hat, or carried a thick stick, or slung a brown canvas bag over his head containing among much else an armoury of pipes, which he would lend to any member of the company who had left his pipe at home. He had somewhat the look of those patriarchal shepherds who come down from the Highlands, driving their flocks before them to the cities of the plain, and uttering marvels of articulation to their dogs. But shepherds do not wear blue serge, nor have they the air and gait of this man. In short, it was as difficult to match Morris outwardly as it was to find the exact peer of him intellectually and morally.

A SLIM sixpenny edition of Rossetti's ballad, "The White Ship," has just been issued by Messrs. Ellis & Elvey primarily for use in schools. The idea is good. Our only criticism is, that the price might as well have been a penny.

AUTHORS can be too modest. Two books by Mr. F. T. Bullen have appeared this week—The Log of a Sea Waif and The Way they Have in the Navy—and both are disfigured by prefaces which carry the art of self-depreciation to a point which causes the reader positive discomfort. "And now, as I know that there are a great many people who do not read prefaces," says Mr. Bullen, "I will close mine by humbly commending this 'autobiography of a nobody' to that tremendous tribunal, with whom lies the verdict of success or failure, and from whose fiat there is no appeal—the Public." If Mr. Bullen could not write we should not mind such preambles, but the stuff that follows is so good that to find the author on his stomach at the outset is particularly annoying. "Who, then, are you," Mr. Bullen elsewhere conceives his readers asking, "that presumes to compete with these master magicians?" The master magicians are "writers like Kipling, Cutcliffe Hyne, Joseph Conrad, and Clark Russell."

THE lapse of certain Tennyson copyrights has projected a number of new editions on the market. Among these are two volumes in the "Canterbury Poets" series. The text, of course, cannot be printed with the author's final corrections. "In Memoriam," for example, cannot be given absolutely complete ; but these defects will probably hinder few purchasers.

TENNYSON is to inaugurate the new series of English classics which Messrs. Methuen & Co. are preparing under the title "The Little Library." The Princess, edited by Miss Elizabeth Wordsworth, is to be the first volume. In Memoriam, edited by the Rev. H. C. Beeching, will follow, and Vanity Fair, edited by Mr. Stephen Gwynn. Each volume will have a photogravure frontispiece.

THOSE who missed "Man and His Makers," the play at the Lyceum (and by no means a bad play) which has just given place to "The Sign of the Cross," missed hearing Mr. Wilson Barrett declaim a specimen of "Occ. verse." The piece of Occ. verse in question, which was referred to in the play as having appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette, helped the heroine to discover the hero after he had "gone under." She read it and thrilled. It begins :

Through the night and the murk the tramp of sorrowful feet,
Heavy and dull on the stones of the pitiless street ;
And some are old and some are broken and all are weak.
"Whither, O millions? Who are you? Say—what do you seek?"

"We are the children of shame, our name is a name of scorn,

Blighted before we had being, and damned before born ;
Nothing we seek, nowhither we wend, no goal in sight,
We have no hope, no help, we drift from night into night.
Cover your smiling faces, veil your arrogant bliss,
We are the stream that flows to a bottomless abyss."

Other information concerning "Occ. verse" is to be found in the Speaker, where a kindly critic gives rules for manufacturing any quantity.

THE Wilson Barrett Birthday Book, try as we will to keep pace with all the best literature, has eluded us. It is advertised in the Lyceum programme as handsomely illustrated, to be had of the attendants. And cheap, too, only seven shillings!

BOOKS written in collaboration are sufficiently common, and there are several instances of a book which, begun by one hand, has been finished by another. But the cases of books which, begun by one hand and continued by another, are finally completed by a third, are in real life rare. Dickens resorted to the plan in the Christmas number of All the Year Round, but the best specimens are to be met with in the regions of burlesque. A serious example, however, lies before us in the shape of Cross Purposes, by the late Emma Marshall. Mrs. Marshall, it seems, began the story, and had progressed as far as Chapter X., when she was attacked by the illness which proved fatal. Her daughter supplied the next three chapters, and then was unable, through illness and grief, to continue, and Miss Evelyn Everett-Green then took up the narrative and completed it. The book is now published by Messrs. Griffith & Farran.

CONCERNING the late Edward Noyes Westcott, the author of David Harum, some stories are told in the New York Bookman. One day he was asked which he liked best, men or women. "I rather prefer men," he said. "They get on together better, and on the whole they're honest." Asked why they are honest, he replied : "Because, for about six thousand years—that is about the age of the world, isn't it?—man has been oppressing her, and mild deceit is her only means of gaining a point." Another of Westcott's beliefs was that champagne was "the only true blender of all the warring traits of a roomful of people." "Never mind what the food is like," he seems to have said ; "so long as the wine is right, the dinner will succeed." Teetotallers must have enjoyed dining there.

MARK TWAIN becomes more and more of a sceptical social inquirer. In the current Cosmopolitan he subjects Christian Science to a caustic examination. There is a touch of the true Mark in the opening :

This last summer, when I was on my way back to Vienna from the Appetite Cure in the mountains, I fell over a cliff in the twilight and broke some arms and legs and one thing or another, and by good luck was found by some peasants who had lost an ass, and they carried me to the nearest habitation, which was one of those large, low, thatch-roofed farmhouses, with apartments in the garret for the family, and a cunning little porch under the deep gable decorated with boxes of bright-coloured flowers and cats ; on the ground floor a large and light sitting-room, separated from the milch-cattle apartment by a partition ; and in the front yard rose stately and fine the wealth and pride of the house—the manure-pile. That sentence is Germanic, and shows that I am acquiring that sort of mastery of the art and spirit of the language which enables a man to travel all day in one sentence without changing cars.

A Christian Scientist staying near by then visits him and they talk. Wishing, however, to recover, he calls in the local farrier and is cured. This is the conclusion of the matter:

The horse doctor charged me thirty kreutzers, and I paid him—in fact, I doubled it and gave him a shilling. Mrs. Fuller brought in an itemised bill for a crate of broken bones mended in two hundred and thirty-four places—one dollar per fracture.

"Nothing exists but Mind?"

"Nothing," she answered. "All else is substanceless, all else is imaginary."

I gave her an imaginary cheque, and now she is suing me for substantial dollars. It looks inconsistent.

THE artists' studies of the symbolic designs for the Daily Chronicle "Address to Madame Dreyfus" have been prepared by the Guild of Women-Binders, and are on view at 61, Charing Cross-road. The designs are by Miss Jessie Wilson, the colouring and illuminating by Mrs. Frank Karalake, and the binding designed and executed by Mrs. Macdonald.

Bibliographical.

EVERYONE hopes that the requisite money will come in for the lectureship which is designed to do honour to Mr. Stopford Brooke. With the literature of our day Mr. Brooke's name will always be honourably associated. His books on our early literature and on Tennyson will live, though the latter is rather too bulky for the subject, and it will be long, too, before his little Primer (both in the revised and in the enlarged versions) ceases to interest the student. His Poems, it is to be feared, have not made a very deep impression upon the general public. It is curious to think what might have been the lot of Mr. Brooke if it had not fallen to him to write the Life of Frederick William Robertson. It was that work—which came out so long ago as 1865—that brought Mr. Brooke to the fore. It led the way to the Theology in the English Poets (1874) and the Christ in Modern Life (1881), which, with the Primer (1878), established their author's reputation both as a thinker and as a critic.

Excellent is the notion of bringing together into a single volume a selection from the sarcasms aimed at the fair sex by brutal man. Woman and the Wits should be a readable book. At the same time, I fear it will but illustrate and emphasise the fact that the wit directed against women has always been a little conventional in subject and phrase. The wags have been inclined to repeat themselves. I have myself made a collection of epigrams on the feminine character, and I find them running on few lines. Woman's levity of mind, her fondness for money, her talkativeness, her shrewishness, her desire to repair artificially the ravages of time—these are the main topics of reproach. Among woman's satirists (in England) have been Herrick, Donne, Rochester, Swift, Pope, Prior, Congreve, Allan Ramsay, Tom Moore, and so forth; but it is rather a significant fact that a great majority of the epigrams aimed at the weaker sex are of anonymous authorship. Let it not be forgotten, too, that man's epigrammatic wit has not always been employed against woman; it has very often been devoted to her praise—from the days of Ben Jonson and Lady Pembroke to those of Sydney Smith and Mrs. Airey.

I presume that the "Mr. H. S. Edwards" who is about to make public Memories of My Time is Mr. H. Sutherland Edwards, best known, perhaps, to the younger generation as a musical critic of acknowledged authority. Of the history of music and musicians Mr. Edwards is, in truth, a master, as witness his books on Rossini and The Lyrical Drama (dating from 1881) and on The Prima Donna (now rather more than ten years old). We have to thank him, too, for volumes on Idols of the French Stage (1889) and Famous First Representations (1886). In all these cases Mr. Edwards has built up very readable works on the basis of a very genuine erudition. He is one of the few specialists who know how to make their speciality appetising. He has written on The Romanoffs (1890) and Old and New Paris (1893), and is the author of some short stories; but I should imagine that his Memories would prove to have reference chiefly to people and things musical and theatrical.

In Some Famous Hamlets, Mr. Clement Scott will dis-course, it appears, of the more important Hamlets of recent times—Sir Henry Irving's, Mr. Wilson Barrett's, Mr. Tree's, Mr. Forbes Robertson's. It so happens that, just fifteen years ago, Mr. Austin Brereton published a little work in which he reviewed Some Famous Hamlets (thus anticipating Mr. Scott's title) from Burbage to Fechter. The two books together will make a fairly complete record, but a fuller narrative would have been more acceptable. Mr. Scott, I note, is to discuss Mme. Bernhardt's Hamlet; why ignore the Hamlets of Salvini, Booth, and others, all within living memory?

In the pages of a weekly contemporary a correspondent has been asking for information about Mr. Bliss Carman, the Canadian verse-writer. To the particulars vouchsafed him I may add one or two. Thus, Mr. Carman's Low Tide on Grand Pré seems to have been first circulated in England in 1893. Three years later that volume was re-issued by Mr. Elkin Mathews with two others—Behind the Arras and Songs of Vagabondia. Another of Mr. Carman's publications is A Sea Mark: a Threnody for Robert Louis Stevenson, which was obtainable over here in July, 1895.

I see there is to be a new edition, with additions, of the little book of verse in which "Hugh Haliburton" set forth Horace in Homespun. That was a bold experiment, but not unsuccessful, though anyone less approximate to a Scot than Q. H. F. it is difficult to conceive. Very Scottish, indeed, is "Hugh Haliburton," whose publications have all been Caledonian in subject—For Puir Auld Scotland's Sake (in 1888), In Scottish Fields (in 1890), Ochill Idylls, and Other Poems (in 1892), and Furth in Field (in 1894).

Rather notable is the persistent popularity of Tom Moore's prose romance, The Epicurean. Very few people, apparently, read his poems nowadays; but for The Epicurean there has always been a demand. If I remember rightly, a sixpenny edition of it was brought out a year or two ago; and before that there was an edition at two shillings. The reprint which is to be issued shortly is, I see, to be illustrated—an excellent excuse for its existence.

The announcement of a forthcoming volume of poems which is to be entitled Rue recalls, by the association of ideas, the Rosemary for Remembrance of Mrs. Brotherton. In the same way the promise of a book of Bachelor Ballads, and Other Lazy Lyrics, brings to mind again the Lazy Minstrel of Mr. Ashby Sterry, and makes one wonder why that rhymester did not dub himself The Lazy Lyrist.

Mr. Herbert Morrah, the new editor of The Literary Year Book, first came before the reading world as the author of a book of 'Varsity verse called In College Groves. This was in 1893. Then in 1896 came the tale called A Serious Comedy, followed in 1897 by The Faithful City, and in 1898 by The Optimist. A new story was due from Mr. Morrah this year. Why break the record?

I have seen it "paragraphed" somewhere that Mr. Henry Grey is about to publish a new book containing synopses of the plots of certain old English plays. Is this really a new book, or is it only a new edition, enlarged perhaps, of the little work Mr. Grey issued some ten years ago under the title of Plots of Some of the Most Famous of Old English Plays?

The Husk of a Novelist.

The Life of William Makepeace Thackeray. By Lewis Melville. In 2 vols. (Hutchinson. 32s.)

THACKERAY, for reasons satisfactory to himself, requested that no formal biography of him might be written. Mrs. Richmond Ritchie, for reasons satisfactory to herself and to everyone else, respected her father's wish. Mr. Lewis Melville, for reasons satisfactory to himself, has attempted to write a biography. Into the ethics of the question we have no desire further to go; but it is obvious that a work written in such circumstances labours under grave disadvantages. Mr. Melville has naturally had no access to confidential documents; he has had to make the best use he can of such scraps of information as are public property, and to sift the available truth out of a mass of gossip and tittle-tattle. To this task he has brought enthusiasm and an unwearied industry. Nevertheless, one remains unpleasantly conscious throughout that it is but the husk and shell of Thackeray that is put before one. The man remains an inscrutable mask: the oneness of inner personality, which should inform with life the somewhat enigmatic phenomena of the world's Thackeray, is unrevealed. And of Thackeray, more than of most men, this intimate revelation is a thing to be desired. He struck his fellows in curiously different ways. There were those who loved him; those whom, like Matthew Arnold, by no means insensitive to his genius, he repelled. Was he at heart a sentimentalist or a cynic? Did he look upon literature as an ideal or as a lucrative profession? Who with authority shall say?

It was Thackeray's misfortune or fault, throughout his life, to come in for more than his share of those somewhat squalid personal controversies which dog the steps of the literary man. He had more than a touch of the fighter's blood in him. Mr. Melville painfully gathers the details. He tells us how Thackeray, like Tennyson, advised Mr. Bulwer Lytton to "leave off scents for his handkerchief and oil for his hair," and how, like Tennyson, he afterwards became anxious to cancel the lampoon. He reprints from the Bookworm Thackeray's letter of protest, written in 1843, against the libels of a Mr. Deady Keane in Fraser's Magazine. He sets forth the whole history of the Yates-Thackeray affair, and the consequent estrangement between Thackeray and Dickens, who took Mr. Yates's part, and the ultimate reconciliation of the novelists on the steps of a club. He discusses the Times review of The Kickleburys on the Rhine, and Thackeray's reply in "An Essay on Thunder and Small Beer," and suggests that the rankle of this retort must account for the Thunderer's "slating" of Esmond, and for the brevity of the obituary notices accorded to Thackeray in the columns of the paper. Well, in themselves these trivialities have lost such significance as they may have ever possessed. We all think now of Bulwer Lytton as Thackeray and Tennyson did then; the Times has had to weather greater storms than that of The Kickleburys on the Rhine. Mr. Deady Keane, whoever he was, is more "Deady" than ever; and the feelings of a society journalist have ceased to be a matter of public concern. But what we should care to know is, how Thackeray felt and thought about such things at the time: whether they really meant anything to him—touched his soul, moulded his character. This is just what intimate letters or a private diary might reveal, and what Mr. Melville, owing to the conditions under which he writes, is precluded from giving us. Heaven defend us, of course, from supposing that we are defrauded because Thackeray chose to withhold it.

Obviously there is another way of getting at the inner man besides that of documents. A great writer's soul must lie in his books somewhere; and one day will come along the man who will treat Thackeray delicately, and, by the subtle alchemy of creative criticism, will reconstruct him for us as he was. A critical biography—in the absence of an autobiography or an intimate biography—that is what is wanted. Does Mr. Melville give us this? Frankly, he does not. There is a good deal of what passes for criticism in the book. The second volume is largely composed of chapters headed: "Thackeray, the Man," "Thackeray as Artist," "Thackeray, the Philosopher," and the like; but it is of a merit infinitely small. Mr. Melville's criticism is anything but of the creative order; there is no glimmer of interpretative genius, of inspired portrait-painting, about it. Not to put too fine a point upon the judgment, Mr. Melville twaddles. A very small sample will suffice:

It is a painful subject to dwell upon—even for those who never knew, or even saw, Thackeray; a picture of fearful sadness to conjure up, this dreadful domestic affliction. His fortune lost, his talents unrecognised (except in a very small circle), his second child dead, his beloved wife taken from him, is it marvellous that Thackeray was able to see the existence of evil as well as of good in the world? The wonder is that he did not become a second Swift, lashing the world and himself with a savage satire, blaspheming at God, cursing at men, sneering at good and evil alike, in some new Gulliver's Travels. Instead, however, the great sorrow chastened his soul, and made his later writings more sympathetic than his earlier; and the only use he made of his great power of sarcasm was to chide, nearly always with gentle hand, the follies of his fellow-men in the endeavour to show to them the path of honour, virtue, goodness, and mercy which he himself endeavoured to follow.

We do not wish to confound Mr. Melville's work in a wholesale condemnation. There are things which he could not do, because he had not the opportunity. And there are things which he has failed to do, because he has not the imagination and literary sense. But the book has positive merits all the same. It is a storehouse of data for the critic of the future. Mr. Melville appears to have read and ransacked everything that has been written about Thackeray: and he has taken especial pains, both in the text and in a full bibliography, over the somewhat tedious task of establishing the sequence and the locality of the novelist's minor writings.

We have entertained ourselves by putting together some of the physical portraits of Thackeray scattered through these volumes. This is Carlyle, about the time of the appearance of The French Revolution in 1837:

I understand there have been many reviews of a mixed character. I got one in the Times last week. The writer is one Thackeray, a half-monstrous Cornish giant, kind of painter, Cambridge man, and Paris newspaper correspondent, who is now writing for his life in London. . . . His article is rather like him, and, I suppose, calculated to do the book good.

This is Motley, in 1858:

I believe you have never seen Thackeray. He has the appearance of a colossal infant—smooth, white, shiny, ringletty hair, flaxen, alas! with advancing years; a roundish face, with a little dab of a nose, upon which it is a perpetual wonder how he keeps his spectacles; a sweet, but rather piping voice, with something of the childish treble about it; and a very tall, slightly stooping figure—such are the characteristics of the great snob of England. His manner is like that of everyone else in England, nothing original, all planed down into perfect uniformity with that of his fellow creatures. There was not much more distinction in his talk than in his white choker or black coat and waistcoat.

This is Mr. Vizetelly in 1843:

A tall, slim individual between thirty and thirty-five years of age, with a pleasant, smiling countenance and a bridgeless nose, and clad in a dressing-gown of decided Parisian cut.

And this is Mr. Lester Wallack, the American actor, in 1856:

I thought him, with his great height, his spectacles, which gave him a very pedantic air, and his chin carried in the air, the most pompous, supercilious person I had ever met; but I lived to alter that opinion, and in a very short time.

Naturally there are some good stories in the book, for Thackeray, whatever else he was, was a fellow of infinite jest; but, naturally also, they are mostly "chestnuts." An amusing account is quoted of the first meeting of Thackeray and Charlotte Brontë. She had formed an ideal, and expected him to live up to it. "Behold, a lion cometh out of the north!" she whispered, as he entered the room. "O Lord!" said Thackeray, when this was repeated to him, "and I'm nothing but a poor devil of an Englishman, ravenous for my dinner!" She sat opposite to him at table:

"I had," he says, "the miserable humiliation of seeing her ideal of me disappearing down my own throat, as everything went into my mouth and nothing came out of it, until, at last, as I took my fifth potato, she leaned across, with clasped hands and tears in her eyes, and breathed imploringly, 'Oh! Mr. Thackeray! Don't!'"

Another story comes from a letter of Thackeray's to the Morning Chronicle, disinterred by Mr. Melville, and printed in an appendix. It is of an Irish officer, who, having stated that he had seen anchovies growing in profusion upon the rocks of Malta, called out and shot an Englishman who doubted his statement. As the unhappy Saxon fell, writhing with his wound, the Irishman's second remarked: "Look, Sir Lucius, you have made him cut capers." "Bedad, it's capers I mane," the gallant and impetuous O'Trigger responded.

Garden, Kitchen, and Farm.

More Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden. By Mrs. Earle. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d.)

A Farmer's Year. By H. Rider Haggard. (Longmans. 7s. 6d.)

MRS. EARLE'S new book is an attempt to repeat the success of her first, the Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden. The circumstance that she dedicates the sequel to the readers of its forerunner is almost an assurance of this success; it is as much as to say: "You can never get on without them both." But it must be stated at once that the new work is not the equal of the other. The original Pot-Pourri was a deliberate, well-arranged, carefully thought-out and carefully written work of good counsel. It contained its author's best, selected from ripe experience. We have a suspicion that much that is in the second Pot-Pourri was rejected from its predecessor. And the sequel is padded to excess, too. A little padding will do, but too much is an evil—and a discomfort as well, for it has made this book unwieldy. Moreover, Mrs. Earle, though her domestic and horticultural counsels are admirable, on such matters as literature and travel is no better than a host of other writers and is inferior to many.

We must not be misunderstood. Mrs. Earle's new book is full of agreeable desultory reading, and it has many pages of great value. Our objection is, that it is very much of a scrap-book, flung together with insufficient thought; and we regret to see a lady of such exceptional good sense falling in with a fashion which commands that a success in literature must be, if possible, immediately repeated. Novelists, who are in danger of being left stranded if they do not keep with the tide, may be excused; but the makers of such books as Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden can hardly be too leisurely. The breathless desire to produce rapidly another four hundred pages of counsel and reflection, because the first has "caught on," should be beneath them.

As an example of the usefulness of More Pot-Pourri we may mention that, before we had looked through it for ten minutes, two questions which had long needed a reply had been answered—one referring to the varnishing of plaster casts, and the other to a certain balsam-bearing tree, the name of which has long puzzled its owner. One has but to open the Index at random in order that some idea of Mrs. Earle's variety may be gathered. Here are entries under the letter "B":

Beef, Boiled, 99.
Begonias, 161, 180.
Berenson, on Modern Art, 354, 355.
Bealer, Basil, 93.
Bible, The Tissot, 162.
Birds, Feeding in Winter, 144, 145; Eating Buds, 204;
The Harm and the Good They Do, 282.
Blackbeetles, To Destroy, 215.
Blackie, Prof., on Squandered Lives, 367.
Blake, William, Allusion to, 422.
Bleeding, for Fever, 223.
Blight on Carnations, &c., Mixture for Destroying, 353.
Blinds, Substitutes for, 397.
Blunt, Mr. Wilfrid, Sonnets on Love by, 414-416.

Mrs. Earle somewhere states that this is the last book of the kind that she intends to write. We suggest, then, that when it has had the best of its run, the two series of Pot-Pourri should be subjected to analysis, and from them two new books should be formed, one confined to the garden and the other to the kitchen. Thereby their value as manuals would be greatly increased. This would mean the loss of such buffer states between the author's counsels as occasional poems from the P. M. G. and funny stories gathered in a Surrey chestnut grove; but the reader intent upon good recipes or horticultural advice would not grumble, and the rest hardly matter.

Mr. Haggard is less of a counsellor than Mrs. Earle. His book is described in its sub-title as a farmer's commonplace book for 1898. That is to say, he does not say, Do this, or, Do that; he says, I did this, or, I did that, or, I shall not do this again. The reader who also farms must draw his own conclusions, towards which Mr. Haggard helps him by printing at the end of the book the balance-sheets of his two farms. Mr. Haggard has altogether about 365 acres of land, of which 261 are at Ditchingham, where he lives, and 104 at Bedingham, five miles away. Part of the land is his own and part he rents at the rate of about a pound an acre. During 1898 the Ditchingham farm showed a profit of £333 5s. 2d., and that at Bedingham of £89 10s. 2d. These sums are, however, subject to various charges for interest, rent, &c., which bring the actual profit down to £80. And taken in connexion with the losses of previous years, the profit is nothing at all. None the less, Mr. Haggard believes, in spite of present scarcity of labour, foreign competition, and all the rest of it, "with plenty of capital, inexhaustible patience, a real love of the thing, and the exercise of about as much general intelligence as would be necessary to move an army corps up the Nile," it is still possible to extract from land in the Eastern Counties (Mr. Haggard's farms are in Norfolk), provided that labour and other conditions are fairly favourable and no great calamity befalls, a moderate rent, an interest on the money invested, and a small living profit. This is the deliberate opinion of one who has tried, and who, we should imagine, is as well fitted to make the experiment wisely as anyone need be.

For the description of Mr. Haggard's own style of farming, and his reasons for it, we must refer readers interested in such matters to the book. Personally, we value the work less for such information than for the healthy open-air feeling that pervades it; the quiet, yet living, description of natural things; and the sane English personality at the back of all. Mr. Haggard is the cultured country gentleman incarnate, although a shade more catholic, perhaps, than most (as when he commends the symbolic drawings of Mr. Horton, and Mr. Sime's audacious forecasts of Hades), and perhaps wielding an abler pen. His book has the best English soundness, good sense, and solidity. It is not another Natural History of Selborne: it lacks the simple charm of that imperishable work; and yet we fancy that long life is in store for it. Truth is mighty and will prevail: Mr. Haggard pins his faith to Truth, and he and that lady may, hand-in-hand, walk far into time.

What the book needs is pruning. Practical and descriptive writing together swell it into nearly five hundred pages, with about 350 words to the page. This is terrific. Perhaps some day Mr. Haggard will extract all that bears strictly on the farm, add to it in the light of later experience, and make one book of that. This would leave for the non-agricultural reader the non-agricultural parts, such, for example, as this:

I suppose that there are not very many people living who have known a person who knew Lady Hamilton, but as it chances I am one of them. In or about the year 1804, Mrs. Bolton, who was Nelson's sister, and her husband hired Bradenham, my brother's house, where I was born, and here Lady Hamilton used to visit them. Indeed, there is a large cupboard in the Red Room that was dedicated to her dresses, whereof the exceeding splendours are still recorded in the traditions of the village. At that time a man of the name of Canham, whom I knew well in his age, was page boy at the Hall, and more than once has he talked to me of Horatio and Lady Hamilton, the former of whom he described as a "white little slip of a thing." I asked him also what Lady Hamilton was like. "Oh," he replied, in the vigorous Norfolk vernacular, "she wör a rare fine opstanding . . . she wör." The missing word is scarcely suited to this page polite, but may easily be guessed. In effect it is a curious piece of contemporary criticism from a source likely to be unprejudiced if outspoken.

And this description of tree-felling:

When the cutting has gone so deep that the shape of the bole approaches to that of a peg-top, the woodmen go to the end of the rope and pull upon it. Probably the tree makes no sign, but, with the exception of an occasional slight quiver as though of fear, which causes the twigs to tremble to their tips, stands as proud and upright as it has stood for the last century or more. Thereupon one of the men remarks to his mate that "she wants a chip or two off the hinder side," and then comes another five minutes of quiet and scientific chopping, followed by a return to the end of the rope. At about the third tug the observer will notice the topmost twigs of the timber bend themselves with a sudden curve, not unlike that of the top joint of a rod when a trout first takes the fly. At the next pull the curve is more sudden, and deeper. Now the great tree begins to groan and rock, and its boughs, rushing to and fro, to flog the air in wide sweeps, but still with a desperate tenacity the thin neck of wood and the remaining rope of root keep it from falling.

"She's a-coming," says the head woodman; "now, together, lad, together." Two more pulls and the doomed tree swings so far that it cannot recover its upright position. For a moment it hangs trembling, as though making obeisance to its murderers; then—a swift rush, a sound of wood rending and of tough roots flying apart with a noise like that of pistol shots, and down it tumbles to the earth with a thunderous rattling crash that echoes through the wood and dies far away upon the breast of the quiet river.

It is done, and a change has come over the landscape; the space that for generations has been filled with leafy branches is now white and empty air. I know of no more melancholy sight—indeed, to this day I detest seeing a tree felled; it always reminds me of the sudden and violent death of a man. I fancy it must be the age of timbers that inspires us with this respect and sympathy, which we do not feel for a sapling or a flower.

That is good and true writing, for which there will always be readers. Mr. Haggard's passages in this vein are excellently illustrated by agreeably poetical drawings by Mr. Léon Little, which add sensibly to the charm of the book.

One little point of criticism. Mr. Haggard, in an interesting account of his visit to the island of Coll, is in danger of giving a false impression of the walking powers of the gamekeeper there. From ten in the morning, he tells us, until seven at night this man strides without tiring; and then, after leaving the game at the Castle, strolls to his house "a league or so away, has his tea, and starts out for a spot several miles in another direction." Now, Coll is only thirteen miles long and from one to three wide, and the shooting on it is, we believe, divided. This is, however, an absurdly minor matter.

Ways They Had in the Navy.

Naval Yarns, 1661-1831. Collected and edited by W. H. Long. (Gibbings & Co. 6s.)

THIS is a book of sailors' and midshipmen's letters—real documents—written from our old wooden warships when the smoke of battle had cleared off. England must have many such narratives, fading into illegibility. The sailor's account of a battle is the true complement of the historian's. One might burrow long among formal records of Anson's fights and find nothing half so illuminating as the letter written by a young tar on board the Centurion to his brother at Winchester. "Dear Brother," he begins,

"here comes joy enuff, we have the grate fortune to meet the French fleet with 35 sail of Marchant-Men a going to Canedee, with 10 Sail of Men of Warr, all ships of the Line. Our captane being the Devile of a man run in amongst the hole fleet . . . such a Battell never was known in the hole World; Shot and Ball flew like hail from the Heavens. . . . In one of the Ships was found thre Milyon of Money, in the other about 16 Milyon. If wee have Justice done us, we shall have a thousand pound a man. . . . Brother, as for the priveteers we have taken a dozen; Damm the French: Drink, dear brother, for we dress mutton in Clarett."

In almost every letter and journal in this collection we are on the lower deck; we haul at the ropes, smell the powder as it comes up, and hear the talk of the men at the guns. If we encounter much that is brutal, and some things that cannot be quoted, there is the stamp of truth on all. A sailor who fought on the Goliath in the battles of the Nile and St. Vincent tells us that the "disagreeable part" of the work begins after the fight, when for days the crews "have no remission of their toil, repairing the rigging and other parts injured in the action." He gives us pictures too. Here is a Turner rudely sketched:

The Goliath led the van. There was a French frigate right in our way. Captain Foley cried: "Sink that brute; what does he there?" In a moment she went to the bottom, and her crew were seen running into her rigging. The sun was just setting as we went into the bay, and a red and fiery sun it was.

A letter written from Trafalgar Bay by a sailor who fought on the Royal Sovereign has some excellent touches:

HONOURED FATHER,—This comes to tell you I am alive and hearty except three fingers; but that's not much; it might have been my head. I told brother Tom I should like to see a greadly battle, and I have seen one, and we have peppered the Combined rarely; and for matter of that, they fought us pretty tightish for French and Spanish. Three of our men are killed, and four more of us are winged. . . . We have taken a rare parcel of ships, but the wind is so rough we cannot bring them home, else I should roll in money. So we are busy smashing 'em, and blowing 'em up wholesale. . . . Our dear Admiral Nelson is killed! so we have paid pretty sharply for licking 'em. I never sat eyes on him, for which I am both sorry and glad; for, to be sure, I should like to have seen him—but then all the men in our ship who have seen him are such soft toads, they have done nothing but blast their eyes, and cry, ever since he was killed. God bless you! chaps that fought like the devil sit down and cry like a wench.

This is splendid. Excellent, too, is the "Journal of a Naval Surgeon, 1758-1763." Mr. Long has wisely printed it exactly as it reads in the MS. A surgeon's eye is a keen eye, and a surgeon's humour is commonly a healthy humour, and this surgeon had both. His journal is a little gallery of naval portraits and interiors. He compares his ship, the Coventry, to a court or a palace that is full of petty rivalries and hypocrisies. A newly-appointed captain, who had been "hoisted over the bellies of better men," soon produced envy, hatred, and malice in the gun-room. The surgeon was rather pleased than otherwise to see this popinjay turn coward when a French frigate hove in view. The captain's intention was to run ashore to avoid the enemy, but this was opposed with many oaths by Mr. Dalrymple, the second lieutenant, a "plain rough-hewn seaman," who modelled himself on Commodore Trunnion, and was so ardent a Scotchman that he would yield nothing to other countries, not even that the silver mines of Mexico exceeded those of Argyleshire if properly worked. The fact that this fine, rugged fellow, who had "never bowed at a levée," deliberately copied Commodore Trunnion, is an interesting tribute to the power of the pen—of Smollett's pen in particular: it suggests a whole series of inquiries into cases in which life is true to literature. In the surgeon's gallery we find one Governor Johnson, who had a sloop of sixteen guns, and, being a literary man, had his cabin filled with books. He had even brought out with him a "literary companion and tutor"—to wit, Mr. Campbell, whom the surgeon vaguely describes as "the celebrated author of Lexiphanes and some other works." This man had been toiling for the London booksellers thirty years when he went to sea with this bookish captain of a man-o'-war. But he soon longed for the flesh-pots of Grub-street, and hurried back from the Lisbon station in the Bellona. On the way three French men-o'-war were encountered, and the unhappy bibliophile was bidden to stand on the quarter-deck as the captain's aide-de-camp. In the height of the action his knees tottered, and he craved permission to go and assist the doctors, whereupon the captain—who had no sympathy with authors afloat—told him he might go to a place much lower than the cockpit. In the same action a young English lady could hardly be restrained from joining in the fray: "she was one of the true Amazonian breed."

Of the general life on board a modern man-o'-war this eighteenth century surgeon gives us several glimpses. It is evident that the naval drawings of Rowlandson do not exaggerate the chaos of dissipation which prevailed between the decks of a war-ship in the Thames or other populous port when a George was on the throne. Once when the Magnanime was to be repaired at Plymouth her whole crew, consisting of 750 men, was put on board the Canterbury and no shore leave given. But the men's wives were allowed to come on board, and they came in such force that the purser soon complained of a very extraordinary expenditure of beer, more than the king's allowance, which is a gallon a day to each man, owing to the great number of females on board, who, being mustered by the admiral's order, amounted to 492, who all declared themselves married women, and were acknowledged by the sailors as their wives; where or when they were married was never inquired, the simple declaration was considered as sufficient to constitute a nautical and temporary union, and which was authorised by long established custom as practised time immemorial in His Majesty's Navy.

"Time immemorial" has passed, taking the old mad, bad customs with it. No longer do Her Majesty's sailors, when paid off, scheme to revenge themselves on any officer whose tyranny or strictness they have resented. In the old days unpopular lieutenants knew what to do when their ship was berthed and unrigged: they vanished. When the Coventry paid off, the tyrannical first lieutenant travelled post-haste to London; but the gunner's mate and a party of men came up with him in Cheapside, gave him a sound drubbing, and rolled him in the kennel.

Not all the contents of this naval portfolio are as good as the Surgeon's Journal; but the book is a little mine of raw material for novelists who deal in frigates and "second-rates."

Sidelights on Paul Kruger.

The Transvaal from Within. By J. P. Fitzpatrick. (Heinemann. 10s. net)

THIS is a book that comes just in the nick of time for those who wish to know the truth about the Transvaal. Its author is South African born, has lived for fifteen years among the Boers, and was for a considerable time secretary to the Johannesburg Reform Committee. He proves on every page that he has a fulness of knowledge out of which to compile his chronicle, and yet he is not unconscious of the disadvantages under which he labours as a writer of history that is still in the making. He frankly poses as a champion of the Outlanders, for everyone else, he says, has been both heard and judged, while the Outlanders have been judged without being heard. Had it not been for the prohibition of the Boer Government, the book, most of which was written three years ago and has since been extensively circulated in private, would have been made public in 1896. The reader knows, therefore, what to expect. He will find in Mr. Fitzpatrick an able and a moderate advocate of the Outlander cause. He will also find that much of the contents of the Transvaal from Within is of local rather than general interest—as the author straightforwardly confesses.

In such a narrative there are, of course, many lights thrown on the complex character of that curious survival Paulus Stephanus Johannes Kruger. "L'État c'est moi" is almost as true of the Dopper President as it was of its originator, for in matters of external policy and in matters which concern the Boers as a party the President has his way as surely and as completely as any anointed autocrat. That Mr. Kruger has fine stuff in him is shown by his answer to an English nobleman, who, in the course of an interview, remarked: "My father was a Minister of England, and twice Viceroy of Ireland." The old Dutchman answered: "And my father was a shepherd." Mr. Fitzpatrick, while unflinchingly and of necessity exposing the misdeeds of the "old Dutchman," is by no means unsympathetic in his estimate of him, as is proved by the following passage:

In the history of South Africa the figure of the grim old President will loom large and striking—picturesque, as the figure of one who by his character and will made and held his people; magnificent, as one who in the face of the blackest fortune never wavered from his aim or faltered in his effort; who with a courage that seemed, and still seems, fatuous, but which may well be called heroic, stood up against the might of the greatest empire in the world. And, it may be pathetic too, as one whose limitations were great, one whose training and associations—whose very successes—had narrowed, and embittered and hardened him; as one who, when the greatness of success was his to take and to hold, turned his back on the supreme opportunity, and used his strength and qualities to fight against the spirit of progress, and all that the enlightenment of the age pronounces to be fitting and necessary to good government and a healthy state.

This surely is appreciative enough. Yet it is hard not to dilute one's admiration for the rugged virtues of the peasant despot when one reads only a few pages further on that Mr. Kruger (in 1877) retained his office for some time after he had concerned himself in the Repeal agitation, but finally resigned his post on being refused an increased remuneration for which he had repeatedly applied. There can be little doubt that had this inducement been forthcoming, he would have remained a loyal British subject. No doubt he would have done better to imitate the honest consistency of Mr. Joubert, who alone of the officials who protested against the annexation refused to take office under the British Government. But no doubt Oom Paul was wise in his generation, for between 1886 and 1899 the salary list of the Transvaal officials has risen from £51,831 to £1,216,394. And here is another historical fact given by Mr. Fitzpatrick. It relates to the year 1884 when a Boer deputation of two visited Europe to raise money and try to get the Convention of 1881 modified:

Messrs. Kruger and Smit were staying at the Albemarle Hotel, where they found themselves, after some weeks' delay, in the uncomfortable position of being unable to pay their hotel bill. In their extremity they applied to one Baron Grant (recently deceased), at that time a bright particular star in the Stock Exchange firmament. Baron Grant was largely interested in the gold concessions of Lydenburg, and he was willing to assist, but on terms. And the quid pro quo which he asked was some public assurance of goodwill, protection, and encouragement to British settlers in the Transvaal. Mr. Kruger responded on behalf of the Republic by publishing in the London Press a cordial invitation and welcome and the promise of rights and protection to all who would come.

His hotel bill settled for him, Mr. Kruger went home, and how he has since treated those he publicly promised protection is long since a matter of history. "Burghers, friends, thieves, murderers, newcomers, and others!" is the elegant opening of an address he delivered not many years ago in a mining district. "Their rights. Yes, they'll get them over my dead body," was his kindly comment on a manifesto published by the National Union in 1895. And few will be found to differ from the verdict of the old Boer two years earlier, when the Raad, under the pressure put on them by the President, rejected the petition of 13,000 aliens for an extension of the franchise. "Now," he said, "our country is gone. Nothing can settle this but fighting, and there is only one end to the fight. Kruger and his Hollanders have taken our independence more surely than ever Shepstone did." Surely the Boer patriots of the Transvaal have memories so short as only to be equalled by those of their brethren in the Free State, otherwise they would not have forgotten that it is written in the records of the Free State:

That on a certain day the President stated in open Raad that proof had been obtained of a proposed combined attack on the Free State by the Transvaal Boers led by Pretorius and Kruger on the one side, and the Basutos under Mosheesh on the other—a horrible and unnatural alliance which was not effected only because Mosheesh could not trust his professed allies. The Raad thereupon publicly gave thanks to the Almighty, who had revealed and frustrated this "hideous complot."

That was in 1857; but the Boers are a conservative race.

There are many pleasanter pages in Mr. Fitzpatrick's book than those on which Mr. Kruger has to be mentioned. He has handled with skill the mass of complications which have attended the Outlanders' struggles to be free; and all who desire to know what has led up to the extraordinary birth-card the Transvaal President sent us on October 10 should read the Transvaal from Within.

To Apollo.

PHOEBUS, to thee the swan sings shrill to the beating of his wings, as he lights on the bank of the whirling pools of the river Peneus; and to thee with his shrill lyre does the sweet-voiced minstrel sing ever, both first and last. Even so hail thou, Prince, I beseech thee in my song.

From Mr. Lang's "The Homeric Hymns: A New Translation."

Catullus of Verona.

Poems of Catullus. Selected and Edited by H. V. Macnaghten and A. B. Ramsay. (Duckworth. 2s. 6d.)

The Story of Catullus. By Hugh Macnaghten. (Duckworth. 2s. 6d.)

THE Latin poets have many and diverse qualities, but with one exception the note of individuality, the "lyric cry," which we moderns look for before and beyond everything in poetry, is lacking. The one exception is, of course, Catullus of Verona. Yet another proof of the grip which Catullus has upon the hearts of his readers is to be found in the two little volumes now before us. They are labours of love, not mere exercises in book-making. One is a scholarly little edition of "the single Roman poet whom no boy has ever wholly failed to appreciate," in his original Latin. This is the work of two Eton masters, Mr. H. V. Macnaghten and Mr. A. B. Ramsay. For the other Mr. Macnaghten is alone responsible. It is an English narrative or, let us say, reconstruction of the life of Catullus, which serves as a thread on which to string verse translations of a large number of the poems. Mr. Macnaghten hopes that it may be read by perhaps even an Eton boy who has read Catullus at school and is a little ashamed at having cared so much for any part of his work; or the sister of an Eton boy, if I may speak out all my dreams, who has read in Tennyson of the "tenderest of Roman poets," and would learn something which her brother refuses to tell of that Catullus "whose dead songster never dies."

Catullus, alas! is untranslatable, but "English" readers may gather from his book a very tolerable idea of what manner of man Catullus was and what his song.

The themes of Catullus are almost entirely personal. His own fierce hates and passionate loves are his inspiration. He knew no reticence, and the tragedy of his brief life can easily be traced from its reflection in his verse. The central figure in that drama is the beautiful and base Lesbia, identified plausibly enough with the Clodia whose subsequent infamies are revealed to us in one of Cicero's most celebrated speeches. Catullus was a Veronese by birth, of good municipal lineage and fortune, the son of a friend of Cæsar—Cæsar whom he afterwards so wholeheartedly lampooned. Coming to Rome as a lad, he fell under the fascination of Clodia, a married woman, ten years older than himself. They loved, and with Catullus love became lyric.

You ask how many kisses can fulfil
Your kisses, Lesbia, or exceed my will.
As many grains as are of Libyan sand
By rich Cyrene in the silphium land Between Jove's sultry oracle and where Stands ancient Battus' sacred sepulchre;
Or many as the stars whose light discovers,
When night is hushed, the stealthy tryst of lovers:
So many of your kisses can fulfil
Love-rapt Catullus or exceed his will,
Beyond the count of jealous tongues to tell
Or prying eyes to blight with envious spell.

For two short years Catullus' pen was golden, and then a shadow fell upon the sun. Clodia proved faithless to him, and he learnt by bitter experience the lightness of a wanton's word.

None else but me, my lady vows 'tis true,
None else for her though Jove himself should sue;
She vows, a woman to her lover: grave
Such words upon the wind and fleeting wave.

At first he struggled to disguise the truth to himself. There were lovers' quarrels and redintegrations of love. A beautiful poem celebrates a momentary return of Clodia to her allegiance:

If that which is the heart's desire be told
Unhoped for, it is joy beyond the rest,
Therefore I count it joy more dear than gold,
That, love, you turn again and make me blest;

You turn, my heart's desire so long denied,
Unasked, unhopèd for. Oh! the white, bright day!
What happiness in all the world beside
Is like to mine? The rapture who shall say?

But at last truth could no longer be hidden, and the lover's idealising fervour turned to a fury of revolt. Clodia broke from him, only to betray another, and then another, until her name became a scandal even in Rome. The taunting epigrams of the forsaken Catullus pursued her almost literally down the streets of the city. Mr. Macnaghten takes pains to point out the parallel between the tragedy of Catullus and the tragedy of Shakespeare, shadowed out so obscurely in the Sonnets. Like Shakespeare, Catullus lost his mistress through his friend. At an early date he appears to have suspected one Quintius of plotting to wreck his happiness, and addressed to him a pathetic quatrain:

If you would have Catullus be your debtor for the light,
The light of eyes, or if there be a dearer thing than sight,
Ah! Quintius, spare to rob your friend of one far dearer prize

Than light of eyes, or if there be a dearer light than eyes.

But the actual traitor was a more intimate friend still. Marcus Caelius Rufus, known as the best dancer in Rome. Rufus had but little joy of his prize, for when Clodia had in her turn left him, she inspired a rival to bring against him a charge of poisoning, and it needed all the eloquence of Cicero to secure his acquittal.

At the moment Catullus lost Clodia through infidelity he lost a beloved brother through death. His "Ave atque Vale" is one of the greatest of threnodies. He turned for consolation from the double shock to foreign travel. He went with the proctor Memmius to Bithynia, and came back in spring refreshed of soul and ready to celebrate the beauties of Sirmio, on the Lago di Garda, in one of the few Latin poems which show real feeling for nature. Then he took to politics, in a literary dilettante sort of way, and pursued Cæsar, rapidly becoming the master of Rome, with merciless epigrams. This is, perhaps, the only decent one among them:

Not overmuch I care,
Cæsar, your friend to be;
You may be dark or fair,
I never looked to see.

Cæsar had the magnanimity and the wisdom to overlook the epigrams, and to ask the epigrammatist to dinner; and, in one of his latest poems, Catullus was in turn generous enough to call Cæsar "great." This poem mentioned the conquest of Britain, which took place in 54 B.C., and probably it was in the same year that the poet died. He was just thirty, an "inheritor of unfulfilled renown."

As has been seen, most of his work was intensely lyric and personal, but there are two or three pieces of wider scope and extreme beauty. There is the famous "Attis"; there is an exquisite Ode to Diana, to be sung by alternating choruses of boys and girls; and there is the great Epithalamium, model of so many Epithalamia of the Renaissance, written for the wedding of Manlius Torquatus and Vinia Aurunculeia. Thus it opens, in the graceful lilt of Mr. Macnaghten's rendering:

God, of Urania son,
Haunter of Helicon,
Who, to the husband's side
Snatching a tender bride,
Hear'st Hymen, Hymen, cried;

Thy flowery brows around
Marjoram sweet be bound,
Come with the joy aglow,
Come with the veil we know,
Yellow shoes, feet of snow.

Come, on this happy day,
Singing the marriage lay,
Raise the song shrill and sweet,
Wave the pine torch and beat
Earth with thy frolic feet.

The Plain Man's Commentary.

Texts Explained; or, Helps to Understand the New Testament.
By F. W. Farrar, Dean of Canterbury. (Longmans. 6s.)

THIS volume is neither a treatise nor a history; it is not a running commentary either; but a series of occasional notes calling attention to "a large number of verses or passages, of which—in matters of varying importance—the force, the beauty, the correct reading, the exact rendering, or the deep special [spiritual?] significance has often been mistaken, overlooked, or altogether obliterated."

Incidentally he does much to justify, in the eyes of the public which resented them, the minute—and at first sight arbitrary—changes introduced by the Revisers. To take an instance, in the narrative of the herd of swine (that gave so much offence to Huxley) there is a slight change from the indefinite to the definite article. "The whole herd rushed," we read in the Authorised Version, "violently down a steep place into the sea. . . ." "Down the steep place" is the correct rendering of the Revisers; and this coincidence reveals itself:

Near the modern Wady Kherza (a corruption of Gergosa) is "the steep"—the only spot on the eastern side of the lake where the swine could have perished in this way; for everywhere else along the coast there is a broad margin of level land between the hills and the shore.

Again, the famous parable of the Sower is introduced by the verse: "Great multitudes were gathered together unto him, so that he went into a ship and sat; and the whole multitude stood on the shore." When "shore" became "beach," the multitude of the English gnashed its teeth with irritation. Yet the word is one of many instances in which exactness restores the evidence that we are dealing with the personal observation of eye-witnesses; for aigialos means properly a beach of shingle, and is here the accurate word for this very spot on the shore of the lake.

An opportunity is missed by both versions in the rendering of the verse which Dean Farrar accurately translates: "On the last day, the great day of the feast, Jesus was standing and cried, saying, If any man thirst. . ." Why this abrupt metaphor? The accurate rendering of the imperfect tense readily suggests that he was watching the doings of the officiants, and here is found the key:

During the Feast of Tabernacles took place the daily ceremony which was known as the Drawing of the Water. . . . One of the Levites went each day with a golden ewer to the pool of Siloam, filled it with water, and brought it in solemn procession to the priest who was sacrificing on the great altar, who emptied it over the altar. The ceremony primarily symbolised the gift of water from the rock in the wilderness. No such ceremony was enjoined in the Law, yet more importance was attached to it in the Pharisaic ritual than to any other, and the Rabbis said that "he who had not witnessed the joy at the drawing of the water knew not what joy was." . . . Jesus had doubtless been standing and watching the water procession when He suddenly cried out to the throng in the Temple: "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, as said the Scripture, and out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."

Where questions of opinion or doctrine are concerned, Dean Farrar is another man; and inasmuch as the scope of the work is too narrow to allow of anything like an adequate presentment of more than one side of any question, his comments are apt to irritate a reader who recognises that to most matters of controversy there are at least two. His manner of treating the famous "Thou art Peter" is an example; the passages relating to the Lord's Supper supply many. But for such as are in general of his mind, for a section of the Church of which he is a pillar and for the evangelical sects akin to it, his latest volume will be a prized addition to the destroyed shelf.

Other New Books.

LOCHS AND LOCH FISHING. BY H. STUART, M.A., LL.B.

WE liked the appearance of Mr. Stuart's book when we unfolded it from the wrapper. The subject was attractive, and, viewed from the outside, the volume was worthy of the theme. Judge, then, of our surprise when the first sentence of the preface hit us in the eye. Here is the first sentence :

Mystery, romance, the freedom of the larger heaven, these are the possessions of the lake, so long as a tarn gleams like a blue jewel set in the swart hills, so long as a legend runs, so long as the commoner of air has a heritage.

Had Mr. Ruskin broken out under a pen-name? That was our first thought. We are modest men; and when a writing is too steep for us we begin by assuming that it must be very grand. On we went, therefore, in much deference, and came upon the following :

Of the mystery the Kelpie is not alone the overlord; he shares the kingdom with many creations of the fancy born of the grey silence under ghostly hills, of the crested wave, white-gleaming above the dark depths, of the ominous calm of the amber-surface fading into the blackness of the inner places, home of the demon trout, that haunts every lake, retaining its legacy of the Wilderness, as an heir of the unknown that may be terrible.

Let us cite another sentence :

Their habits, however, diverge with the estuary, while their environment, keeping in view the retroactive influence of life conditions on habits and of habits as qualifying through heredity the relative and not the absolute conditions of existence necessary, postulates certain requirements for the sea-trout with which the salmon can afford to dispense.

These passages are not exceptional. The whole book is written in the same strain. The present writer has often fished in the region with which Mr. Stuart deals, and would have been glad to find the book worthy of a long review and high praise. Mr. Stuart, we daresay, may have much knowledge; but his method of expression is neither intelligent nor intelligible. (Chapman & Hall.)

GOOD CITIZENSHIP. EDITED BY THE REV. J. E. HAND.

The preface to this book of twenty-three essays is by the Rev. Charles Gore, and is an admirably clear piece of writing, containing the whole spirit of the essays which follow. The book is a plea for a more conscious, a more general, and a more thoughtful citizenship—something between the "extreme individualism of Mr. Herbert Spencer" and State Socialism in any form. The average Englishman is so practical, says Mr. Gore, that he is very apt not to think. "An Englishman often knows hardly anything and thinks about hardly anything except his own home, his own business, his own pleasure, and his own place of worship." He does not bother his head about politics; he even makes a virtue of his abstention. Whereas his abstention is the vice of politics, and the strength of narrow and unworthy factions and soulless financial interests.

The intentions of this book are excellent, and its themes, Old Age Pensions, Re-Housing, Cottage Homes, Ladies' Settlements, &c., are well chosen. Our only fear is that it lacks the attractiveness which such an appeal should have. We handle the book gravely, survey it with reverence, but—our thoughts travel to the level plains of Brixton, the hill country of Islington and Upper Holloway, the marshy flats of Lambeth, and the virgin building sites of Ilford and Hither Green, and we wonder what chances this book has of turning little apathetic householders into social zealots. We are sure that a single novel called The Citizen, written by a fine—a not too fine—hand, embodying the same teaching, would be the right weapon. In these days one novelist shall chase a thousand, but twenty-three essayists, led by a High Churchman, will appeal mainly to those who are already in the vineyard. Unfortunately the novel is not written and the Essays are. We wish the book well, and we would our faith were stronger. (Allen. 6s.)

BY WAY OF CAPE HORN. BY PAUL EVE STEVENSON.

Strictly speaking, this record of four months in a Yankee clipper is not a book at all: it is the material from which a book might be made. Mr. Stevenson's capacity for taking careful notes and using his eyes and ears is adequate; but that is, of course, not enough: the real work comes later. At a loose computation there are some 136,000 words in this volume, of which 68,000 are superfluous. We should advise Mr. Stevenson to read Mr. Bullen's Cruise of the "Cachalot," and, when next he takes a voyage, to endeavour to keep to relevance as well as that narrative does. This is the best kind of thing we get in By Way of Cape Horn :

But if this fellow is well read, what can be said of old Kelly, in the mate's watch. We pumped together yesterday afternoon and had much conversation, during which he said that he hailed from Charleston, but that his family had moved north to Troy when the war broke out, and that his parents had brought him up strictly and decently. He volunteered no reason for having turned sailor, but branched off into literature, beginning with a pertinent quotation from Burns and another from Moore. These led him on, and he expressed great admiration for ancient history, concluding with a well-turned eulogy on Gibbon's Rome, with illustrations for preferring it to any other account of that great empire. At first it seems extraordinary to find so intelligent a man before the mast, living a beast's life, and surrounded by men with whom he has but little in common. Yet such fellows are by no means uncommon on sea, for one often happens upon a man in a Cape Horner's fore-castle whom Nature did not intend should be there.

How different is old Kelly's conversation from that of the mate, especially at dinner and supper, when he shouts out his witless jokes! To-day he burst in with the following silly story, and it was totally irrelevant to what we were talking about: "There was a hold feller I knew once that lived in the country, and when 'e saw the telegraph wires put hup past 'is farm, 'e 'ung a pair 'o boots on 'em to send 'em to 'is son." At the conclusion of such pleasantries his sense of humour is so agitated that he seems upon the brink of spasms, and his temporal arteries swell out as big as lead-pencils, while he chortles and wheezes and gasps like an old tattered bellows.

The book is homely, veracious stuff, rough and pertinent; but it is too little compressed and separated by too much weather. However, for readers with infinite diligence it may be something of a treasure. (Lippincott.)

HUBERT HERVEY.

BY EARL GREY.

This is the record of a career moulded by the new Imperialistic trend of British foreign policy. "It is a grand thing to die for the expansion of the Empire," wrote Hervey in one of his letters, and he did it. His early life and occupations were quiet. On leaving Cambridge he settled with his mother in London, and acted as assistant secretary to the Health, Inventions, and Colonial Exhibitions held at South Kensington. Society, fishing, and travel sped his generous leisure; but Hervey's heart was in a life of adventure. "Instead of which I shall probably end my days having never accomplished anything greater than directing envelopes in a temporary iron office built by Messrs. Humphreys & Co., the great contractors at Albert Gate." However, he was permitted to spend two years checking transfers in the offices of the British South Africa Company, years in which his eyes were fastened on South Africa. The death of his mother releasing him from filial obligations, Hervey went to South Africa, and was given a post in the Law Department at Salisbury. The Matabele rising of 1893-1894 suddenly gave him opportunities for action. He joined

Dr. Jameson's force, and fought at Shangani and Bembesi, returning to a better civil post at Salisbury. His letters describe African life in a plain, clear way. From Devil's Pass, near Umtali, he writes:

The whole scene here is very characteristic: wagons, oxen, Kaffirs, bush and mountains, donkeys, and a tent. . . . I have taken a few books with me, three plays of Shakespeare, a Virgil, and some selections from Burke. You see, all this will bear reading and re-reading, and space is a consideration in the veldt.

In 1896 came the further attempt to dislodge the Matabele from the Matoppos Hills, and in leading his men to occupy a ridge Hervey was fatally wounded. His career was regulated by high motives, and one wishes that the "expansion of the Empire" were being effected by more men of his stamp. (Arnold. 7s. 6d.)

PRESENT-DAY EGYPT.

BY FREDERIC COURTLAND PENFIELD.

Mr. Penfield is the United States Diplomatic Agent and Consul-General to Egypt. This book is what he says it is, a "discursive budget of information and comment." Its illustrations are familiar and inevitable. There are temples, and palms, and water-carriers, and dahabiyehs. We turn to the chapter on "Britain's Position in Egypt." It is, on the whole, complimentary. Egypt has been rehabilitated by a body of officials not exceeding one hundred in number, and:

England possesses a capacity for conducting colonies and rehabilitating run-down countries which amounts almost to genius. Overbearing and arrogant as the British functionary out of England often appears to be, he must be scrupulously honest and generally capable to find a place in the perfectly organised machinery guided from London. Frenchmen say that Egypt's restoration to prosperity could have been better accomplished by them, and some allege that this prosperity is more apparent than real, charging that much is neglected in the desire to make a favourable showing in the yearly balance-sheet. But a frank investigation of what France does with her own dependencies, nearly every one of which is run at a loss, gives support to the belief that Egypt is better off under British guidance than she could be under that of France. No alien power could have done better in Egypt than Great Britain has. But her critics claim to recognise scant justification for Britain's absorption of the country of the Khedive merely because of her ability to do good work there, and point to the glaring flaw in her title.

Mr. Penfield is enthusiastic on the advantages of Egypt as a health resort. (Macmillan & Co. 10s. net.)

THE EVOLUTION OF THE ENGLISH HOUSE.

BY SIDNEY OLDALL ADDY.

Each volume of the "Social England" series of handbooks, now appearing under the able editorship of Mr. Kenelm Cotes, is written by a specialist, and traces in detail the history of one or other of the various phases of native life in this country. The Evolution of the English House, an important branch of the subject, is treated by Mr. Addy in a manner at once interesting and erudite. The writer traces the development, then, not of the lordly mansion, but of the labourer's humble dwelling, from its earliest beginnings. The bay, which, to judge from deeds, leases, and other documents, was the unit of measurement, was no accidental nor arbitrary standard, but such that originated simply in practical convenience. It was determined by the average space occupied in stalling two yokes of oxen abreast. The pair of "crutches" leaning together make the pointed outline of the roof; and from these "forks"—in German gabel—is derived our word "gable." The connexion between the word "threshold" and the threshing-floor is less obvious, until it is realised that, in days when the ground floor was, for the most part, neither paved nor boarded, the stone doorstep had to do service also for threshing purposes. How low a standard of comfort prevailed, and for how long a period, is indeed astounding. The comparative lateness of the use of window-glass is a case in point. Mr. Addy instances Hardwick Hall as evidence of the sudden cheapening of glass in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Had such enormous windows been more general at that time, one would be forced to accept the writer's conclusions, but as Hardwick is altogether exceptional, its peculiarity must be attributed rather to the caprice and ostentation of the lady builder than to economic causes. Another statement of the writer's must, in the absence of dates to support it, be called in question. He declares that the building of houses with overhanging upper storeys was a fashion imported subsequently into the country from the town where, clearly, the object was to provide the utmost amount of room within the house, and at the same time to avoid encroaching on the roadway without. But surely there is a utilitarian motive for this mode of construction both in town and country—namely, that, in the absence of gutters and pipes, it was highly desirable to carry the rain at such a distance away as not to soak down the walls nor sap the foundations of the building.

THE INTERNATIONAL GEOGRAPHY. ED. BY H. R. MILL, D.Sc.

Geography has taken on so many attractions of late that those of us who were nurtured on the dry bones of the science barely twenty or thirty years ago can scarcely recognise the text-books of to-day as the descendants of the compilations of mouldy facts and dreary figures to which our youth was doomed. But it has been reserved for the seventy authors whom Dr. H. R. Mill has gathered round him to produce a volume that surpasses in combined interest and usefulness any of its predecessors of which we are aware. Someone had the bright idea of inviting an acknowledged pundit on each of the chief divisions of the world's surface, and wherever possible a native of the country described, to write in the language most easy to him a continuous account of his own land. Statistics are barred in the body of each narrative, and, instead of catching the eye and delaying the mind in mid career, they are banished for leisurely reference to the end of the chapter. All the contributions have, of course, been translated into English under the superintendence of the editor. It is a most admirable idea most admirably worked out. Rarely has such a bulk of the latest scientific research been so attractively decked out. The book is equally enjoyable and useful according to the student's desire for a well-written description or for a thoroughly up-to-date work of reference. A few of the names will illustrate the high standard aimed at and achieved. Mr. Bryce tells the tale of the Free State, the Transvaal, and Natal. Prof. Grenville Cole, of Dublin, has Ireland entrusted to his charge. Prof. Erodí, President of the Hungarian Geographical Society, surveys the kingdom of the Magyars. Sir Harry Johnston brings our knowledge of British West Africa, British Central Africa, and Tunisia up to the latest attainable point; and there is a good illustration of the book's thoroughness in the note on the change in management of Nigeria, which only happened some ten weeks ago. Prof. Nansen appropriately breaks the ice of our ignorance of the Arctic regions; Mr. Selous writes of Southern Rhodesia; Prof. Aitof describes Russia; Prof. Bertrand, of Santiago, discourses of Chili; Sir George Robertson, of Afghanistan; and Prof. Thoroddsen, of Reykjavik, of Iceland. Prof. Davis, of Harvard University, gives the historical and political geography of the United States at a length and with a clearness specially worthy of note. The book is most conscientiously indexed, and illustrated by maps that are unusually clear and handy in size. It should be in every public library and many private collections. Cannot Sir George Newnes (whose pet Antarctic is not forgotten) give us a companion volume on history on a similar plan? (George Newnes, Ltd.)

Fiction.

On Trial. By "Zack."
(William Blackwood & Sons. 6s.)

It seems impossible that this simple story of Devonshire folk should fail to arouse enthusiasm among students of good fiction. Its inspiration is so ample, vigorous, and fresh, and its execution so masterfully free, that one is much tempted to hail it with those superlatives of praise which, alas! may not be employed because they are soiled by glib and ignoble use. If "Zack" is not yet a master, she is on the way to become such. She has the magic, inexplicable gifts of vision and song, and she has them in full. As you read her pages you feel, beneath the surface of expression, the strong, easy, leisurely pulse of an imagination calmly exulting in its own power. There is no question here of "making the most" of a talent—of piecing it out with ingenuities and painstaking and heavy labours. Clearly, "Zack" has much to give, and she gives it easily. She is exempt from the cares of imaginative poverty. She sees, she feels, she writes, and doesn't count the cost. She can afford to be generous.

On Trial is the history of a coward, a mean and despicable coward. Dan Pigott was in the army, but when the call came to active service he bought himself out with fifteen pounds sent to him by Phoebe, his sweetheart. Then he returned to his native village to find Phoebe in disgrace. She was in the domestic employ of Dan's uncle, and Mr. Pigott had dismissed her for stealing. She had stolen the fifteen pounds, and, though she had escaped prosecution, she was ruined for life. Dan had excellent intentions, but he had no self-confidence. He knew that he was a coward. Asked by his uncle how he obtained the money for his discharge, he said that he won it on a horse. He was guilty of the infamy of blaming Phoebe to himself. Time and again he swore to speak the truth out, but he never did. He added idiotic carelessness to his cowardice, and lost a letter of Phoebe's which bore his incrimination on the face of it. If his uncle should see that letter he would lose the heritage of the farm. The letter fell into the hands of one Silas Trustgore, an ostler and a hoary, superstitious knave, and Trustgore consistently blackmailed Dan thenceforth. Dan told Phoebe, and Phoebe entreated Trustgore's old sweetheart Anne to get the letter. Anne was dying. Trustgore went to see her, and she told him that she could not die in peace because she heard "a mort of voices," and above the rest Dan Pigott's, "the wail of a damned soul . . . and it witnesses continually afore God agin me and agin you."

"Speak for me, Anne; speak for me!" he pleaded, sinking on his knees beside the bed. "Tull Him I be reckoning to ha' done wi' evil ways and repent. Tull Him I have put by a tidy bit o' money, and sha'n't be uncharitable to them that goes in need o' it."

"'Tis dark . . . dark . . ." she repeated; "I can't find the gert white throne, and what wud it profit if I flung mezelf face down 'pon tap the steps . . . the Almighty wudn't heed while that voice testifies on . . ."

"But I'll be easier wi' the lad; I'll no' ruin him," Silas cried in a terror stricken voice. "Zee," he continued, fumbling with trembling fingers in the lining of his cap, "zee, here be the letter. I ain't never showed it to Varmer Pigott, though I've had a mort o' temptation. Take it, Anne, lay it afore the Almighty—the lad can't witness agin me then."

He pressed the letter into her hand and her fingers closed upon it with the stiff grip of death. Her eyes turned back in their sockets, leaving only the white exposed: she opened her lips—a curious sound, half gurgle, half rattle, forced itself between them, and she fell forward on her face—dead.

He bent over and shook the prostrate form. "Testify, testify!" he shrieked.

She paid no heed to him.

Then he tried to take the letter from her; but she would neither give it up nor witness for him.

The uncanny and terrible adventures of the letter do not end there, for the "layer-out," Sarah Emmett, gets it, and, because Phoebe once laughed at her, takes it to Farmer Pigott. The episode is closed with a tragedy.

The coward's character is seized and drawn with a perfection which is at once relentless and exquisite. You have here realism of the sternest and most delicate. But we do not know that the coward is better done than the other inhabitants of the village. Phoebe, with her essential purity and her passionate clinging to this shabby figure of a man, is a memorable and beautiful creation. Trustgore and Sarah Emmett are two of the gauntest, most sinister and forbidding persons that we remember. The author has, indeed, brought out with singular force and effect the superstitious and graveyard side of the Devonshire peasantry. In particular, the prophetic conversations of Sarah Emmett are to be noticed for their dark and suggestive terrors. The whole book is dark, overcast, with gleams shooting through it.

In a novel where style and matter have an equal distinction, we have only one fault to find. Call it a quasi-fault. To our mind, On Trial is scarcely a novel. It is a short story elongated, and elongated a trifle too much. Towards the middle of it, one might urge that an inevitable climax was not being approached with sufficient directness. The incidents cease for a time to be indispensable. Smollett (who was a great man) once wrote: "A novel is a large and diffused picture, comprehending the characters of life, disposed in groups . . ." &c. We think much of the importance of that phrase "large and diffused." It seems to us to touch the essence of the matter. On Trial is neither large nor diffused. It is an episode. Dan loses a letter, and tries to keep it back from a certain destination; but it reaches the destination. That is all. The mere letter is too continuously prominent. You can't write a novel about the adventures of a letter. It is a short story.

Yet there is enough stuff in this short story for half-a-dozen six-shilling novels. Only reviewers know how excessively rare is this quality of plenteous inspiration, and how delightful the sense of security which it induces in those who spend their lives in watching fountains trying not to run dry.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE SLAVE.

By R. S. HICHENS.

An experiment in diablerie by the author of An Imaginative Man. The central figure is a beautiful girl whose absorbing passion is for jewels, and about her flit a diamond merchant, a musician, and other persons of latter-day London. In effect the book has something of the fantastic weirdness of the Arabian Nights. One of the most gruesome burglaries and struggles that we remember is to be found in Chapter XXXII. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE BARRYS.

By SHAN F. BULLOCK.

A brisk, genial story of young people in Ireland, by the author of Ring o' Rushes. In the first chapter we meet a charming ferry girl. "Her shoulders were broad, her head well-poised, and she ran with the freedom and grace of a deer. She wore a brown linsey skirt, . . . an old, discoloured jacket, . . . and over her hair, which was gathered behind into a coarse, black knot, a man's tweed cap." She rowed like a man and had the brogue of an angel. (Harper. 6s.)

PABO THE PRIEST.

BY S. BARING-GOULD.

Mr. Baring-Gould's last book, published a month ago, was a collection of short stories of modern Devonshire. His new one is an historical tale of Wales in the reign of Henry I. It tells of Henry's attempt to subjugate the Welsh clergy, of whom Pabo was one of the mightiest. The last chapter deals with the loss of the White Ship. (Methuen. 6s.)

WINE ON THE LEES.

BY J. A. STEUART.

Mr. Steuart, leaving such subjects as he dealt with in his Minister of State, here presents us with a polemic against drink. "I infer," says one character, "it's no longer true good wine needs no bush." "And you infer rightly," said Mr. MacTor with emphasis, "God bless my soul! it needs a whole forest of bushes—most seductively arranged." Mr. Steuart's purpose is serious. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE VIZIER OF THE TWO-HORNED ALEXANDER.

BY F. R. STOCKTON.

The new fantastic serio-comic story by the author of The Lady or the Tiger? The Vizier, who had the gift of everlasting life, eventually became Mr. Crowder, a modern American, and meeting Mr. Stockton, told his strange story. "Have you had many wives?" Mr. Stockton asked him. "That is a subject," he replied, "of which I think as little as I can." (Cassell. 6s.)

RESOLVED TO BE RICH.

BY EDWARD H. COOPER.

This novel by the author of Mr. Blake of Newmarket is well described by its title. And the moral of the story is unobtrusively patent on every page—if we may put it so. Thus: "Their love of money becomes gradually absorbed into a passion for money-getting, which is not only the most unhappy disease upon earth, but nearly always brings its victims into difficulties, and thence occasionally into gaol, for the simple reason that there is a limit to the amount of money which you can get honestly." At the end of the story there is a liberal distribution of sentences of penal servitude. (Duckworth & Co. 6s.)

SIGNORS OF THE NIGHT.

BY MAX PEMBERTON.

A collection of eight exciting stories "of Fra Giovanni, the Soldier-Monk of Venice, and of others in the 'Silent City.'" The frontispiece represents one gentleman on a table, another boring into his chest with an auger, and three more standing by. The author's name is sufficient guarantee that the work is sensational. (Pearson. 6s.)

COMETHUP.

BY TOM GALLON.

Comethup is the name of the hero. He received the name from a somewhat Dickensian protector when left an orphan in the first chapter. At the mother's grave the words "He cometh up . . . like a flower" occurred and recurred to him; and wishing that the baby's name should have a memory of the mother in it, he decided on "Comethup." A pretty, sentimental book. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE TREASURE SEEKERS.

BY E. NESBIT.

A lady, who is best known for her poetry, here enters the lists of historians of child life, and gives us the adventures of the Bastable children in search of a fortune. Incidentally we meet with a juvenile paper containing this anxious request: "Legal answer wanted. A quantity of excellent string is offered if you know whether there really is a law passed about not buying gunpowder under thirteen." (Unwin. 6s.)

THE EMPEROR'S CANDLESTICKS.

BY BARONESS E. ORCZY.

An exciting story of plots and plotters in Vienna, culminating in the sale of the candlesticks in a London auction-room. Candlesticks, it seems, can be used not only for their original purpose, but as receptacles for secret papers; hence this book. The emperor was Franz Joseph I. (Pearson. 3s. 6d.)

THE SCARLET WOMAN.

BY JOSEPH HOOKING.

A book for Dissenters according to pattern. Ladies who pass the collection box and mothers who "meet" will buzz around it with Protestant tremors. The illustrations are also quite the thing. Under one we read: "Nothing seemed impossible to Lancaster." He is merely carrying a live nun down a ladder in the dead of night. (Bowden. 6s.)

PATHS OF THE DEAD.

BY HUME NISBET.

"She belongs to the tribe of whom the experienced Solomon has truly written: 'Whose ways are crooked and froward is their paths. Her house inclineth unto death, and her paths unto the dead.'" Her name is Mrs. Hyacinthine Hart-Beachcomber. The writer says: "I may tell you candidly I never wrote a more interesting romance. It has kept me up perfectly engrossed many a night when I ought to have been in bed." (John Long. 6s.)

A HONEYMOON'S ECLIPSE.

BY SARAH TYTLER.

The honeymooners were the Rev. Allan Farquharson and Tina, his wife, and the eclipse was the result of insufficient knowledge of each other. It began in a small way, and led to a separation, but at the end of the book they are united again. The work has a pleasant undercurrent of quiet humour. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)

JENETHA'S VENTURE.

BY COLONEL HARCOURT.

A tale of the Indian Mutiny by an Indian soldier. The scene is Delhi at the time of the siege, and the heroine is one of the Englishwomen in the beleaguered city. A number of the heroes of the Mutiny are introduced, and the story rings with the prowess of British arms. (Cassell & Co. 6s.)

AS OTHERS SEE US.

BY WATSON DYKE.

The first sentence—"Ask the doctor if he is coming in to tea"—is about as exciting as any other in this story of small comings and goings, small scandal and tittle-tattle, and local fuss in a seaside place in Lancashire. But the chief characters—who are connected with a grammar school—are carefully studied. The interest belongs a good deal to the musical world. (Unwin. 6s.)

EUREKA.

BY OWEN HALL.

Another fanciful romance of ancient and new. A band of officers travelling in Ceylon come upon a document setting forth the adventures of Anaxagoras, a captain under Alexander the Great, in India. By its guidance they reach a spot still inhabited by the descendants of Anaxagoras and his companions, a little tract of ancient Greece flourishing in the middle of the nineteenth century. Love follows. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)

THE FINAL GOAL.

BY BESSIE DILL.

A moral-pathetic story. An old Scottish laird has defrauded his wife and son and wasted his opportunities, and there are great wrongs to be righted. They are righted amid a crash of marriage bells. A pleasant, safe story, in which the ordinary unexact novel-reader will immediately become interested. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

ELUCIDATION.

BY A. QUARRY.

There are few things more embarrassing than to find a novel described, like this one, as "A Matter-of-fact and True Tale." The game is over then; even the mystery of a family grave is dull and ancient as a last year's newspaper. (Unwin. 3s. 6d.)

GLEN INSCH.

BY MRS. CORBALIS.

A Highland love story laid in a salmon-river glen owned by Sir Andrew MacInsch, a miser, who counts his gold by the light of one candle and stints his children. (Moran & Co. 1s. 6d.)

"Boy, only Boy."

"It's not brutality," murmured little Hartopp, as though answering a question no one had asked. "It's boy; only boy."—STALKY & CO.

QUITE possibly "boy" is about to be widely exploited in fiction. He seems to be in the air. Through the literary press there runs that obscure rumour of him which to the initiated may presage a boom. At any moment we might receive the announcement that he is formally "discovered"—using the term in the special literary slang sense. The only outward and obvious sign of this probable movement is the almost simultaneous appearance of two "boy" books, by two leading novelists who have not hitherto been over and above addicted to the study of schools. We refer, of course, to Mr. Kipling's Stalky & Co. and Mr. Eden Phillpotts's The Human Boy. But the actual publication of a book is often only the last of a series of symptoms. Never forget the magazines. For ourselves, we are inclined to go back three years in order to find the beginning of "boy." It was in October, 1896, that a story by Mr. Phillpotts, called "The Piebald Rat," appeared in the Idler. If a "boy" movement does set in, that particular tale must be deemed the inception of it. Perhaps it gained little attention. Nevertheless, it was remarkable, for it was a realistic study of "boy," and of a very curious side of "boy," the superstitious side of him. Broadly speaking, it may be said with confidence that "boy" is not superstitious—he would not understand what the word meant—but superstition may occasionally seize him unawares, with the strangest results, and Mr. Phillpotts has found a case equally convincing and (in a subtle sort of way) uncanny. We regard "The Piebald Rat" as one of the few essentially serious examinations of schoolboyish idiosyncrasy yet attempted. Here let us not be suspected of imagining that Messrs. Kipling and Phillpotts invented the schoolboy. We know our Lord Ormont, and though boys are not of the essence of it, we put the first chapter—that fine fragment—among the sparse masterpieces of "boy." And we do not forget Tom Brown, nor Vice Versa, nor The Kindness of the Celestial. Least of all do we forget Tom Sawyer and Huck Finn. But of these (the Meredith excepted) every one has been written either for the taste of boys, or with a facetious intention. We are not aware of a single book chiefly about boys previous to 1899 which is soberly aimed at adults. There are men who, not having read it in youth, can enjoy Tom Brown, but they enjoy it by virtue of the boy which is in them; it is not serious fiction. We admit that Mr. Phillpotts's recent book is not, on the whole, serious fiction either. Its intention is plainly humorous, and truth is stretched to that end. Still, it contains "The Piebald Rat," and it contains other lapses into the sternness of genuine realism. It is a sign.

Now Stalky & Co., we are convinced, is put forward entirely as genuine realism. It may be humorous, but that is an accident. It is meant with exactly as much sincerity as The Man Who would be King is meant. It is Mr. Kipling's idea of "boy." Of that we feel sure: just as sure as we feel that Mr. Kipling's idea of "boy" is magnificently wrong, superbly and glitteringly untrue. The fact is, that in Stalky & Co. Mr. Kipling has yielded up his secret. And his secret is, that he has never ceased to be a boy. When he sat down to write Stalky & Co. he had not to divest himself of manhood. That strange alchemy of the imagination which metamorphoses the artist at the artist's will was not necessary. His extraordinary memory had merely to seize the proud visions of the past. The boy had remained, and the mature writer was happy to serve the boy by unscrupulously glorifying the boy's ideals. To the devil with truth, probability, possibility, justice! To the devil with everything that might mar the ancient ideals, constructed when the world was not too much with us! And so you get the Stalky trio: monsters of ingenuity, resource, retort, learning, invincibility, and determination; angels of light in that they never once fell away from the rectitude of their own codes! They are great, they may arouse enthusiasm; but they are not boys. And though they have the realism which of right belongs to whatever the artist has passionately seen, they have no other realism.

The case of Mr. Phillpotts is diametrically opposed. In him the writer desiring to write is uppermost. Accustomed to regard the universe as "copy," he comes across "boy," and instinctively says: "Here is material." He approaches "boy," and observes it. But he observes from the outside. To him "boy" is not, as with Mr. Kipling, something special. It ranges side by side with other matters of interest to the novelist—such as the bucolic, the marine, the criminal, the senile, the various feminines. He holds no brief for a particular sort of boy, nor for any boy. He is impartial, aloof, calm. He wants the material—only for humour, as it happens—and he gets it. He gets it partly from his observation of character, but more from his surprising faculty for the invention of illustrative incident. In this detail he differs sharply from Mr. Kipling, who does not care to invent; witness the hackneyed poison-sucking episode which disfigures "A Little Prep." Mr. Kipling, having his incident, will embroider it to dazzle; Mr. Phillpotts, having his incident, will give it you plain, relying on its freshness and his ability to continue inventing. Mr. Phillpotts, though he is less forceful, because less interested, is certainly nearer to life than Mr. Kipling. You can recognise his boys, despite the fact that he frequently exaggerates in order to provide fun—fun being avowedly his first aim. We wish that he would one day allow the author of Children of the Mist to write a book about boys. The result might be quite notable, if tales like "The Piebald Rat" and "Corkey Minimus" (as to parts of it) may be taken as an indication of what that author would do if Mr. Phillpotts the humorist would let him.

"The more I know of boys," said Prooshian Bates, "the less do I profess myself capable of following their moods." And indeed the first novelist who studies them dispassionately and scientifically, as Flaubert studied the provincial middle-class woman, may as well, while he is about it, devote his whole life to the affair. He will have his reward of astonishing discovery in an almost virgin field. It will be his part to cast away every theory of "boy," and begin by collecting and collating facts. That many of these facts will appear beyond belief is certain, seeing that such meagre, obvious "boy"-lore as is already ascertained borders on the incredible. Consider the boy's amazing capacity for chopping up his existence into moments—each, as it were, a watertight compartment. You may safely work a boy to the verge of death with "extra-tu," sure that the minute he enters the playground he will have forgotten what a book looks like. The quality is most precious, but it has its defect, since it renders him incapable of "carrying on" by his own unaided impulse. He would seldom see a thing through. This is where Stalky & Co. disclose their unusualness. With them, to undertake is to finish, and in the meantime never to forget. Another strange point is, that there is nothing hurts a schoolboy's feelings more than articulate adult sympathy. He loathes all "jaw," but most of all he loathes the "jaw" of the well-intentioned, sympathetic master—such as Mr. Prout. Under continued "jaw" the schoolboy gets uneasy, and he will end by "chaffing." The relations between Prout and his house constitute, perhaps, the truest portion of Stalky & Co. On the other hand, he likes discipline if it be stiff. But (another curiosity) the disciplinarian should be genial. The boy loves a discreet geniality. When you cane or give lines you mustn't laugh, you mustn't exhibit the most trifling excitement; you must be calmly and coldly genial. Yet a third mysterious trait of "boy" is his unerring instinct for divining all the complicated secret difficulties of those who rule him, and taking his advantage therefrom. He has never been told, but he knows precisely why an under-master won't appeal to the Head, and precisely at what moment the under-master, choosing the lesser of two evils, may be relied on to do violence to his inclination in that respect. With what accuracy he will estimate a new master, and balancing the new master against the Head, and the Head against that Parental Interference which has grown so much of late, will create a policy to meet the situation! "Boy" is always a great statesman. It is his statesmanship, coupled with the plethora of unemployed teachers, that resolves many schools into a battlefield of diplomacy, in which the boys and the Head are pitted against the under-masters. Compare Stalky & Co. To our mind a characteristic stranger than any we have mentioned is the attitude of "boy" towards ill-health. He can understand sickness in a woman, and he can understand it in himself. You may sit by his bedside and tell tales (if you are fool enough), and he would be grateful were it not that "boy" never is grateful. But fall "seedy" yourself, and insist on your seediness, and he will drop you as a hopeless puzzle. He is psychically incapable of believing that a grown man can be unwell. Even your death would only baffle him. Then there are the relations between boys and girls, and between boys' schools and girls' schools. It is certain that even small boys can "spoon" with and get passionately fond of small girls. Look at Tom Sawyer. More than one critic has said that Tom's love affairs are a mawkish blot on a masterpiece. We think not. We have known affairs quite as serious and impassioned in real life; but in love there is "boy" and "boy." Schools may be divided under three heads: the small private school, where girls are usually scorned, and the mere presence of a girl causes discomfort; the larger private school, where the number of bigger boys induces a more tolerant mind and a great deal of innocent flirting, accomplished with pride and pleasure at every opportunity; the public school, where, to put the thing briefly, the boys are men.

Yes, it is clearly apparent that the serious novelist of "boy" will have a task of terrifying difficulty. But sooner or later the courageous, enthusiastic man will come along. Perhaps, despite the indications of a "boom," his veritable hour is not yet. Perhaps, nay certainly, the public is not quite ready to hear the exact truth about its beloved schoolboys. The author who published it, say, next week, would have a reception compared to which the original reception of Ibsen was an ecstatic welcome. But time passes, and freedom broadens down, and we arrive ultimately at the most distant horizons. Meanwhile, "boy" will not change; "boy" is changeless.

I AM hungry. I am cold. So much the better. I suffer what the people are suffering. Decidedly horse is not good for me. Yet I ate some. It gives me the gripes. I avenged myself at dessert with the following distich:

Mon diner m'inquiète et même me harcèle,
J'ai mangé du cheval et je songe à la selle.

Over-Writing.

THE Worshipful Company of Phrase-Makers has become a prosperous guild since its formation, some ten years ago, under the tuition of a strong and dominant personality. Writing ill was proscribed, a nucleus was formed, and a weekly journal became the Bible of the new school. In many respects it was a good school, though like all good things it has been overdone. If most of our young authors have nothing to say, they are agreed as one man to say it curiously. What is needed is matter as distinct from manner, brains as distinct from taste. And as the deficiency of matter is made up one would wish to see the excess of manner toned down. This does not mean that when great themes arrive style will deteriorate; it means that when great themes arrive, style will become sturdy and direct. It was ever so. There is an eternal see-saw relation between matter and style. Too little matter, too much style, and vice versa. But just as a see-saw may come to a stop twixt see and saw (boys know the awkward poise that baulks enjoyment when the weights are too equal), so in literature you may find a baffling (but not unhelpful) inertia caused by a want of relation between style and matter. The matter may be excellent, but the style may hold it in dreary thrall.

To drop metaphors, I find this curious, unprofitable poise in a novel I have just laid down; and the fact and the details seem worth noting. Mr. Bernard Capes's story, Our Lady of Darkness, is so good in substance that one could weep for its sins of style. Mr. Capes gives, and takes away. The story is concerned with secondary effects of the French Revolution. We see those effects in Paris, in London, and in a small village near Liège. The human material on which the fitful lightnings play is varied and interesting. There is a palsied, be-rugged, amorous English peer that Thackeray could not have drawn with surer touches: "At no period of his life had he so realised his ideal of existence as when, upon his seventy-seventh year, he found himself false—inside and out—from top to toe." There is St. Denys, a fatuous Flemish squire—political hypocrite and hypocritical lover; Théroigne Lambertine—full-blooded village belle and Parisian she-devil; the fragile Nicette—village saint and murderess; and for hero, Edward Murk perfecting himself in hardy English graces of character under our eyes. What, then, is wrong with Our Lady of Darkness?

Just this: it is over-written. It is fretted and fogged by a style that must give the average reader as much pause as Gothic lettering. That Mr. Capes is enrolled of the Phrase-Makers we knew, but he has run ahead of the craft, and is weaving strange fabrics in the wilderness. He is nobly infatuated with rare words and exotic similes. He justifies Costard's satire: "Remuneration! Oh, that's the Latin word for three-farthings. . . . Remuneration, why, it is a fairer name than French crown. I will never buy and sell out of this word." However, I hope to see Mr. Capes sell out of his present style and buy literary tact. That is all he needs to be a very fine novelist. As it is, he forgets his reader in his subject, and is so intent on collecting that he forgets to convey. He deposits jewels in your sight and walks off. He does not so much write for you as he permits you to see him write. This is magnificent, but it is not literature.

Liège at noon. Edward Murk, aristocrat and strolling artist, has surveyed the town from the hills, and is descending a hill into the market-place:

At its foot . . . he seemed to come upon the actual furnace floor of noon—a broad Place that bickered, as it were, throughout its length with iridescent embers. These were figured in crates of Russian cranberries glowing like braziers, in pomegranates' bleeding fire, in burning globes of oranges, in apricots pearly-pink as balls of white-hot glass; and over all, the long looped awnings of olive and stone-blue and cinnamon served to the emphasising of such a galaxy of hot dyes as made a core of flame in the heart of the blazing city. The close air prickled with a multitudinous patter of voices like blisters of fat breaking on a grill.

This is over-written. The intentions are excellent, and so are the materials, but there is a want of tact toward the reader. The bickering of iridescent embers is a phrase that stops and confuses him at the outset. We should have been inducted more gently, more gradually, into the description, which, however, is still terribly overloaded with "pearly pink balls of white-hot glass" (objects which not one reader in ten thousand can visualise), "hot dyes" "core of flame," and the amazing simile that recalls a kitchen in Gower-street. We are not told in what exact expression Edward vented his impatience with these meteorological conditions. Probably he followed a celebrated preacher and muttered, "It's damned hot"; all we are told is that, "exhaling some little of the breath that remained to him in an appropriately volcanic interjection, Ned mounted the steps of the church . . . and dived into the sequestered obscurity of amber-scented aisles," where (wonderful city!) "the immediate fall of temperature took him by the throat like a shower bath."

In this church is a girl, kneeling before a shrine. The effect of the light upon her form is described :

She was very pure and colourless, apart from an accidentalism of tinted rays; for over her soft brown hair, from which a folded chaperon of white linen had slipped backwards, wings of parti-coloured light, entering through a stained window, played like butterflies. Lower down, the violet haze that slept upon her cheek gave her something of a phantasmal character; but her fingers were steeped in crimson as if they were bloody.

The description of this girl's fingers, "as if they were bloody," merely shocks the reader, who must turn two hundred pages to find that this phrase is symbolical and prophetic of Nicette's crime. But he need turn only thirty pages to find Nicette's fingers treated in another vein :

She was skimming cream from a broad pan with her fingers. The tips of these budded through the white, like nibs of rhubarb through melting snow.

This simile is absolutely bad. It is like producing a rabbit from a hat. It is no office of a simile to startle, or to exhibit a writer's cleverness, but graciously to interpret one idea by another. And mere resemblance between two remote things is no test of the aptness of the simile in which these things may be suddenly allied by a literary athlete. In fact, the simile which springs from unusual information in the author, and presumes it in the reader, should be charily used. It would be quite wrong to say that it must be never used. To forbid a writer to trawl the deeps of speech for new locutions would be absurd. Only—he must use tact. When Edward Murk leaves the social kitchen of the Landlust Inn at Mericourt and retires to his bed we are told :

In the distance the voices of his late companions droned like hornets in a bottle.

Now this simile is better. Its unexpectedness is not too acute, its call on the reader's knowledge is not exorbitant, and to the imagination it is distinctly apt and satisfactory. Again, one accepts a simile on page 84. The girls, Théroigne Lambertine and Nicette, are talking, each with a hot heart, about the Englishman. When Théroigne tells Nicette that Murk has left the village for Paris and will not return until the spring, the poor girl comes round to her "with a face like hard ivory." This simile does its work without fuss; it is brief, natural, effective. It is the antithesis of one in which Mr. Capes describes the attitude of a waitress who is rebuked by Mark for her pertness :

The girl stood as solid on end as a pocket of hops.

Here we are back to parlour magic. We are also—by implication—twitted with never having been inside an oast.

The truth is, that Mr. Capes cannot—at present—be trusted to write quietly about quiet things. He reminds me of a player who is excellent in speech and action, but retains the amateur's vice of restlessness when it is his turn for silence. It is a fatal thing for one of Mr. Capes's characters to pause or wait in any little act or process. If he does so for a moment, Mr. Capes goes into contortions of by-play and description where such entertainments are not wanted, or are wanted only in moderation. An example occurs on page 131, where Murk has returned from Paris and again approaches the chateau.

He stood a minute before passing through the gates. The warmth of a windless night still slept in the velvety eyes of the roadside flowers. Morning was heaping off its bed-linen of glistening clouds. From a chestnut-tree came the drowsy drawl of a yellow-hammer. A robin—small, fashionable idler of birds—abandoned the problem of a fibrous seed and, flickering to a stump, discussed the stranger impertinently and with infinite society relish. Only the swifts were alert and busy, flashing, poisoning, diving under the eaves; thridding Ned's brain as they passed with a receding sound like that made by pebbles hopping over ice; seeming, in their flight of warp and woof, to be mending the pace set by the loitering day. Feeling their activity a rebuke, the visitor passed through the open gate.

There is really nothing in the context to justify this descriptive passage. I say nothing of the allusions to velvety eyes and bed-linen, and the simile of pebbles on ice to describe the sound of receding swifts on a hot day.

Again, it is reasonable that when Murk is put to wait for his first meal in the "show-kitchen" of the "Landlust," he should look round on its Flemish interior, and that Mr. Capes should tell to us what Murk—an artist—saw. The likening of the kitchen to a bright toy is good, and we welcome the "polished, dark dresser vessels" and the "lidded flagons, and the narrow-necked, wood-stoppered, resonant jugs"; but I rise in some alarm when I am told that the fireless stove was "a shining, cold example of continence." Next morning Murk has to wash in a basin of pie-dish dimensions, so he "fretted out an ablution that was a mere aggravation of drought." This is otiose, as is the sentence :

He worked out the sum of argument very coolly and carefully; and the result, condensed from many germinant postulates, showed itself arithmetically inevitable.

To do Mr. Capes justice, the last two examples of his style are hardly typical. There is usually method in his madness. His anxiety to do everything well is beyond praise, but it leads him astray. Take even this description of a cottage :

It was sunk in a bosket of evergreens; built of luffer-boards that gaped in many places; and its roof of flaking tiles was all sown with buttons of moss.

Now this is an accurate description. If Mr. Capes had spared his readers the unfamiliar word "bosket"—which is not at all essential—and had called the roof simply a tiled roof, then he (the reader) would have had leisure to find in the "luffer-boards" and the "buttons of moss" the rightness and inevitability which these words really harbour. Mr. Capes is in all things too zealous. He has knowledge, and he has words, and he can use both, but he forgets that a reader's receptivity is a pint pot. If he will only remember this, he will do. This is a good novel spoiled by phrase-making.

Dreyfus and the Old Testament Hokhmah.

IN a recent number of the ACADEMY we asked for mottoes to be printed on the title-page of a history of the Dreyfus Case. In that marvellous monument of Hebrew poetry and religious philosophy, the Book of Job, there are at least two good mottoes for a Dreyfus book.

With every desire to be both just and generous to Captain Dreyfus, one is bound to deny that he is, in any reasonable sense of the words, either martyr or confessor—he was not called on to die for his faith, or made to suffer for the maintenance of any lofty principle. He was a victim, a sufferer unjustly at the hands, as appears, of wicked and unscrupulous men. If a parallel is to be sought from history or literature, the comparison should be neither with Admiral Byng nor with Jesus Christ. Dreyfus is a (happily living) incarnation of the problem that perplexed so many generations of his pious forefathers, the problem of the Hokhmah—why God, their God, a just God, should so often let the wicked prosper and cause or allow the innocent to suffer. The Book of Job is the most impressive presentment of the problem, and, if it does not solve it, gives us the last word the Old Testament has to say to troubled Jews and Christians.

One verse (chap. xxxi., ver. 35) has a quite startling relevancy, not at first apparent, to the case of Dreyfus, the sentence which in the Authorised Version runs: "Oh that . . . mine adversary had written a book!"—a clause too often cited as if it might really be the prayer of a malignant literary critic seeking a chance of vengeance on an enemy who thus gave hostages to fortune. We all know that this is one of the many unlucky renderings of the A.V.; but do not always remember that in the Revised Version it reads: "O that . . . I had the indictment mine adversary hath written!" Might not Dreyfus speak so of the Secret Dossier, the real indictment?

The parallel between Job and Dreyfus is, of course, not exact: Dreyfus, for example, seems to have been much more fortunate in his wife and friends. Job's wife may or may not have believed him to be an innocent sufferer, but her advice was far from encouraging. "Curse God and die" some commentators think meant "Renounce this God, and end your misery by suicide"—the very thing his wife's love kept Dreyfus from attempting. The Adversary, the Satan, had leave to afflict Job beyond endurance first in his property, then in his person, but failed to tempt him from duty: even after his wife's evil counsel Job sinned not, neither charged God foolishly. But when his three friends, convinced without a scrap of evidence that Job must be guilty, exasperated him with the pious platitudes he rejected so unceremoniously, the patriarch, heretofore really patient, lost temper and charged God very vehemently, if not foolishly, upbraiding Him with injustice. He not merely insisted, in general terms and repeatedly, on his own absolute innocence, his perfect life and stainless character (assertions so unlike the confessions of a succession of psalmists), but, after reciting all the iniquities he had not committed, iniquities such as, had he been guilty of them, would have rendered him justly liable to some measure of punishment and suffering, he confidently demanded to be told what was the crime or guilt with which he was charged.

Verses 35, 36, 37 of chapter xxxi. are thus translated in the Revised Version:

Oh that I had one to hear me!
(Lo, here is my signature, let the Almighty answer me;)
And that I had the indictment which mine adversary hath written!
Surely I would carry it upon my shoulder;
I would bind it unto me as a crown.
I would declare unto him the number of my steps;
As a prince would I go near unto him.

Mr. Montefiore, in the recently published second volume of his most admirable Bible for Home Reading, gives, like Prof. A. B. Davidson, whom he often follows, a substantially similar rendering (the critical clause being with him "Oh that . . . I had the charge which mine adversary hath written!"); and he thus interprets, long before the trial at Rennes, the purport of Job's contention:

Job abruptly implores God to hear him. He has now, as it were, handed in his plea and signed it. Let God reply. He does not fear God's charge. Let the indictment be produced. He wants to know it. He would even welcome it. In the pride and certainty of his innocence he would bind God's indictment upon his brow, and, crowned and garlanded like a prince, he would draw near to God in the full confidence of victory. He would seek to conceal no incident of his past, not a single one of all his steps in the path of life. Thus Job's last words sound a note of triumph.

Job had sounded a note of triumph in an earlier chapter of the book (xix. 25-27), which again admirably expresses Captain Dreyfus' attitude—although again, oddly enough, it requires a more accurate translation than that of the Jacobean translators to bring out the sense. We shall take, first, that of Mr. Montefiore himself, who, thus cautiously following Prof. Budde, renders a famous, but admittedly difficult and probably corrupt, passage in the Hebrew text:

But I know that my Vindicator liveth;
And at the last (?) he shall appear upon the ground; (?)
And . . .
And from out my flesh (?) I shall see God,
Whom I shall see to mine own good,
And mine eyes shall see him and not as one estranged. (??)

The dots and queries are Mr. Montefiore's, and indicate his unwillingness to force a meaning. But by some little emendation of the Hebrew, Prof. Cheyne gets a sense which suits the present case almost as well as Job's:

But I know that my Avenger lives,
And that at last he will appear above (my) grave;
My witness will bring to pass my desire,
And a curse will take hold of my foes.
My inner man is consumed with longing,
For ye say, How (keenly) we will persecute him!
Have terror because of the sword,
For (God's) anger falls on the unjust.

This is, of course, the famous and debated passage about the Goël, which, in the Authorised Version, begins, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and gets a tolerably complete but wholly unauthorised sense by the interpolation of the words worms, body, &c. The Revised Version keeps "redeemer" (with a small "r"), but gives "vindicator" as alternative. There seems little doubt that vindicator, or avenger, is the true sense; and it is surely interesting to be able, with a good conscience, to envisage M. Zola as, for this time at least, fulfilling the function of the Old Testament Goël.

Let us hope that Captain Dreyfus' ultimate fate, long before his death, may justify the fullest confidence he can cherish or the Book of Job convey; but that if he should not succeed in making his innocence clear as the day to all Europe, and secure the complete restoration of his honour as soldier and citizen, he may at least enjoy peace, health, a good conscience, and such temporal well-being as the Epilogue gave to the Man of Uz.

Silas Marner, too, had to face and endure a baseless and shameful charge, an unfair trial, and a cruel and monstrous conviction, and, after all, to live it down, how successfully and tranquilly, in patient, gentle, loving work for others, we must all remember. But even at the end the best his kindest neighbours could say to him was: "It's the will o' Them above as a many things should remain dark to us. . . . You were hard done by that once, Master Marner, and it seems as you'll never know the rights of it; but that doesn't hinder there being a rights, Master Marner, for all it's dark to you and me."

Studies in Contemporary Style.

II.—Split Phrases.

As "J. W. K." notes in his letter published last week, the infinitive is not the only phrase which is split occasionally. Frequently the indicative is treated with similar familiarity. It is so this week in a letter by the Poet Laureate published in the Times. Here is the sentence:

Though I cannot in the least agree with you in what you much too partially say in your letter of October 6, I feel I ought not to neglect the opportunity, however slight it may be, of inducing your countrymen to pronounce a fairer verdict on the conduct of the English Government, and to form a more just estimate of the policy of the English people.

In that sentence the Poet Laureate splits two phrases: in the least splits the first; much too partially splits the second. Thus, "J. W. K." has a considerable authority for his theory that he is at liberty to split the indicative when the sense of euphony tempts him to do so. Authority, however, is one of the elements in judgment about style of which it behoves the student to be suspicious. Addison is reputed to be a master of English style; but it is possible to show that he errs in grammar almost in every page. Addison has charm; but charm is one thing, and grammar is another. The Poet Laureate has force and eloquence; but those are qualities about which the grammarian has something to say only when they intoxicate a writer's sense of syntax. The intoxication is noticeable in the sentence which has been quoted: in the least splits the indicative without adding either to the meaning or to the force of the sentence; much too partially, which splits the other phrase, denotes an idea which is misplaced. The sentence should have begun thus:

Though I cannot agree with you in what you say, too generously, in your letter of October 6,

Mr. Austin's rhetoric would not have lost anything if it had been put with grammatical propriety. Similarly, "J. W. K.'s" diction would not lose either in grace or in appeal if, instead of saying I heartily thank my Heavenly Father, he said I thank my Heavenly Father heartily.

Here let it be noted that the temptation to split the indicative by an adverb usually arises from lack of perception that the idea which the adverb expresses is useless. If "J. W. K." did not thank his Heavenly Father heartily, he would not thank Him at all. Frequently students of style will discover, on careful analysis, that when they have written a sentence in which there is a split indicative they have done so, with the Poet Laureate and "J. W. K.," because they were encumbered by a superfluous idea.

A danger which besets the pen of a writer who splits the indicative is exemplified, opportunely, by a note in the Pall Mall Gazette:

We were aware that Her Majesty's Government would, in no circumstances, accept the help of native allies.

As in no circumstances is parenthetical, one is entitled, in studying style, to read the sentence with the words left out; and then the sentence expresses the opposite of what the writer means.

The split indicative can be justified in poetry; but it is not necessary in prose. In prose, however, it is much less offensive than the split infinitive. Neither the split indicative nor the split infinitive can be called ungrammatical; but each is a violence to the sense of style. Sometimes, being unnoticed, the split indicative is less outrageous than the other vulgarity, which is as great an outrage in all cases as would be the bearing of a man who should wear a red necktie at a lady's evening party.

Things Seen.

Ingratitude.

It was in a crowded tramcar in Berlin, about half-past five on a winter's afternoon. Opposite me sat a stout woman in a white apron, and next her a thinnish girl struggling to keep some eels in a net.

Suddenly the thinnish girl raised her voice:

"What about your daughter, Frau Schmidt?"

The stout woman turned and looked at her curiously.

"Are you asking after my daughter?" she asked.

"Yes; how is she?"

The other one shrugged her shoulders. "You know how ill she was, don't you?" The thin girl nodded. Her companion seemed not to have noticed the nod and repeated the question: "You know how ill she was?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Well, we had the doctor"—she sat with her hands spread upon her ample knees, her round black eyes fixed unseeingly upon the window. "He said: 'Nourishing food.' I said: 'You mean——?' He said: 'Fresh meat every day, soup made of meat, eggs, milk.'" She ticked off the different articles of food with her left hand on her right, beginning with the little finger. She paused.

"And——?" drawing out the one word till it sounded like a whole sentence.

"When she got no better I said to the doctor: 'She don't seem to relish her food much.' 'He said——?' she broke off and gazed slowly and comprehensively at an over-dressed Jewess who entered at that moment, rustling in silken skirts and flashing light from her earrings as she seated herself. The stout woman nudged her neighbour, and they both stared fixedly at the newcomer, leaning forward to obtain a better view of her.

"And the doctor said——, Frau Schmidt?" queried the thin girl.

"The doctor said: 'Give your daughter anything she likes: chicken, rice, fish, fruit, veal, red wine. And she had them all, whatever she liked: chicken, rice, fish, veal, fruit, red wine, and——champagne.'" Her voice grew louder, more emphatic, and at last almost reproachful. "And what does my daughter do?" she asked, turning square round and facing her neighbour, her hands still aloft after again ticking off the viands, the thinnish girl agape with expectation. "What does she do?" the stout woman reiterated, answering her own question with a resounding slap of her thigh. "She dies."

The Elixir of Youth.

THE innkeeper at Yvoir ushered us, with fatherly solicitude, into a long room stifled with the heat of stove and lamp. He was an old man, but in his narrow eyes, in the infinity of his wrinkles, in all his gestures, there was such a quicksilver animation that every bit of him seemed a-twinkle. He served the dishes of pallid meat and glowing omelette himself, aided by his son, a heavy, stupid-looking young man, with smooth face polished a dull brown melting imperceptibly into the shaven hair. An open piano stood at one end of the long table, and whenever the young man passed the instrument he struck a few discords on the notes. My friend was amazed at this aggressive display of boorishness, and regarded the young man with undisguised indignation. Thereby he was prompted on the next occasion to strike with his free hand a harsher clatter on the piano. The father, happening to be in the room at the same time, stooped over to my friend, and beaming with pride and kindness, whispered "Il joue: il est eune."

"Melibœus in London."

The announcement of a new volume of essays by the late Mr. James Payn reminds me of a little collection of brightly written sketches of his which was issued as far back as 1862, under the title of Melibœus in London. This book is not without an autobiographical interest, for the wide and peculiar knowledge it displays of London could only have been gained at first hand. Yet it has never been reprinted, and Mr. Payn used to say that its want of success was to be attributed to the fact that most of the people who would have read it were uncertain as to the correct pronunciation of Melibœus, and consequently afraid to ask for it at the libraries. Melibœus—which was always a favourite of its author—is one of his most characteristic writings; it is a veritable example of his high spirits, and is full of excellent stories which are told in Mr. Payn's own inimitable manner. The account of a country gentleman's visit to see the sights of London in the sixties does not in itself suggest any great fund of entertainment, yet Mr. Payn handles his subject so adroitly that in reading the book one lives for the time with tolerable pleasure in that impossible period of history of "bird's-nest" whiskers and the crinoline. What better testimony of its merit can be needed! Another interesting feature is that the book is a very worthy tribute of regard to the author's master—Charles Dickens. It is in no sense an imitation, for Payn's individuality was sufficiently strong to save him from playing the "sedulous ape," but he was not deterred from showing who taught the 'prentice hand its cunning.

Mr. Watson's Poems Again.

I have already indicated in what Mr. Watson's chief claim to greatness consists; but such poems as the "Ode in May" represent only one aspect of his many-sided genius. The poet has thought much and thought deeply on life's problems, especially man's origin and destiny, and the source of all things. In many of his poems these themes are alluded to; but the two most important are "The Hope of the World" and "The Unknown God." Though there is much that many will disagree with in the latter poem, all must be struck with its thoughtfulness, earnestness, and wonderful melody.

With what sympathy and insight does he write of his brother poets, of whom he claims to be the humble follower and remote kinsman:

But it was mine endeavour so to sing
As if these lofty ones a moment stooped
From their still spheres, and undisdainful graced
My note with audience, nor incurious heard
Whether, degenerate irredeemably,
The faltering minstrel shamed his starry kin.

The reader will call to mind "Wordsworth's Grave," "Shelley's Centenary," "Lachrymæ Musarum," and "The Tomb of Burns"—poems alike worthy of their author and their themes. I cannot bring my brief remarks on Mr. Watson's poetry to a close without referring to and quoting one of his beautiful short lyrics. I feel sure that no lover of poetry who has read the following exquisite little "song" will ever forget it. It is a flawless gem, which ought to be printed in every anthology of nineteenth century poetry:

April, April,
Laugh thy girlish laughter;
Then, the moment after,
Weep thy girlish tears!
April, that mine ears
Like a lover greetest,
If I tell thee, sweetest,
All my hopes and fears.
April, April,
Laugh thy golden laughter,
But, the moment after,
Weep thy golden tears!

London in October.

The misty beauty of autumn has descended once more on London. The past week has given us day after day of veiled brightness, tenderest distances in the Strand, and golden tracts of space on Holborn Viaduct. The leaves are dropping at last in Lincoln's Inn, not torn by bandit winds, but falling gently on the grass. How well it is all described in Mrs. Marriott Watson's little poem:

Here, as the green leaves fade, the gold leaves fall,
A still enchantment widens over all,
Painting the streets with vague autumnal dyes
Like ancient tapestries;
Touching to fantasy unfelt before
The motley hoardings' many-coloured lore;
With every floating leaf, each sound that sighs,
Seizing the sense with something subtler yet—
The deep exhilaration of regret
For this sweet hour that flies.

The long, barge-laden stream
Bears on the roseate haze, the golden gleam;
The leaves go hurrying at the light wind's call
As to some festival.
While we, half sorrowful, half exultant, too,
Blown by the old year's breath to meet the new,
Stretch forth our hands to greet we know not what
So fair forever is the unknown lot!
So strong the glamour of the London street,
With dim expectancies

Holding the heart in bondage stormy and sweet,
Here though the dead leaves flit,
Doubt shall not hold dominion over it,
Nor age, nor sorrow, but sensuous sheer delight
In the blue, lamp-hung night.

Thine are our hearts, beloved City of Mist,
Wrapped in thy veils of opal and amethyst,
Set in thy shrine of lapis-lazuli,
Dowered with the very language of the sea,
Lit with a million gems of living fire—
London, the goal of many a soul's desire!
Goddess and sphinx, thou hold'st us safe in thrall
Here while the dead leaves fall.

I need not remind ACADEMY readers how well Mr. Henley has written of October in London.

Improvement by Elision.

But for your direct invitation I would not have unburdened myself of an elision I have always wanted to see made in a very fine poem—Scott's "Ballad of Rosabelle." Two or three times he repeats "lovely Rosabelle," in my judgment making such a blot on a delicate piece of work that I wonder he did not himself see his bathos. "Lovely Rosabelle" is a very feeble collocation of words in itself, the more so as the "belle" contains the lovely, and is not so amalgamated with the English as to have lost its significance. When occasionally reading the ballad, I cannot help omitting the "lovely" (even to myself), and in the last line it is to my ear and sense perfectly unendurable, especially as you have a fascinating line without it. Scott very seldom does a very striking thing in verse: here he has done it and spoiled it by one word.

C. S. OAKLEY.

Rudyard Kipling.

Although standing almost alone among the critics, the writer in the ACADEMY seems to me to have pronounced a true and sound verdict upon Stalky & Co. One hopes that it is an illusion, and yet the thought comes again and again that Mr. Kipling's later productions are by no means equal to the earlier work which made him famous. With the gain of vitality has he not lost in a serious degree his admirable art of self-restraint? Compare, for instance, these rough, ragged, almost formless sketches of boy life, with their wearying waste of dialogue leading practically nowhere, and the crisp, artistic reticence which made Plain Tales from the Hills almost perfect models of short stories.

Is it a fancy, too, that Mr. Kipling's humanity has waned? Where is now the kindly heart-power which one found so moving in The Light that Failed? Despite the brilliant technical knowledge displayed in The Day's Work, one sighed for a little human nature—something more spiritually satisfying than the superficial mention of things. [Mr. Jamieson forgets "William the Conqueror."] And Stalky, M'Turk, and Beetle strike one as too clever to be real, far too heartless to be convincing. Surely no boys' brains ever scintillated like theirs, and no boys' tongues ever framed such unceasing reams of slang!

HERBERT JAMIESON.

D'Annunzio and Mr. Whiteing.

OF Mr. Richard Whiteing's delicate satire, The Island, in its original form, we have already recorded our opinion. But the author has recently taken it again in hand and added two chapters, and Mr. Grant Richards has just published the revised edition. The two chapters show how the hero and narrator of the story, the Person of Quality, attends a soirée of nations, for the especial purpose of meeting the Light of the Age, who is, we fear, no one but Gabriele D'Annunzio, the Italian novelist. The chief of the Symbolists was there, the chief of the Mystics, the chief of the Decadents, and so forth. But the Light of the Age tarried, and, while awaiting him, the author reflects thus:

Each group had held the public ear for but a moment, baffled by the shortness of the lobe; each saw in the other a beaten competitor, or a threatened rival. Yet, from their ecstatic allusions to the coming man, it was easy to see that each found his account in that representative figure. He stood for the union of all their dogmas; and, for each struggling conventicle, his present vogue was victory confirmed or renewed. Each had at least a sixteenth of a thirty-second part in him, so his personality might have served to illustrate the indivisibility of matter as effectually as a New River share. To the Impassive he was precious in its flower. To the Symbolists, he stood for the furthest conceivable range of vision through a brick wall. To the Mystics, he was moonshine in purest ray serene. To the Decadents he was scorn and loathing for the state of life to which it had pleased God to call the majority of his fellow-creatures. To the Devil-worshippers he was the epigram of mockery in a new setting.

At last the Light of the Age comes. This is the passage:

Alarums and excursions in the antechamber, a gentle tumult at the door, a sound of the friction of silk on silk, as the women press forward to form an alley of skirts for his advance. The Light of the Age is here.

A dandy of the dandies. Youth, or its perfect counterfeit, slimness, and in his make-up a glory of all those industrial lords of the bedchamber who furnish the broadcloth and the fine linen, or whose business it is to keep a moustache for ever curled in Mephistophelian scorn, towards skies which its wearer disdains. For the rest a bold eye, a full and sensuous lip, features passably regular, and, in the whole air, an ineffable self-complacency only to be matched by the plastic abstractions of Eastern worship.

"Chère Marquise" (bending low over her hand), "have I offended? The shadow of your eyelids touches the bottom of my heart."

"From his last play," whispered the Bostonian. "What a genius for compliment!"

The Marquise.—"Cher maitre!" (pardoned for a phrase).

His French was of the trans-Alpine variety. But so was Buonaparte's, yet he led a whole nation to whom his talk was as that of an organ-grinder.

The Marquise.—"Must we congratulate you on your election to the Italian Chamber, dear Poet? But why soil your winged feet in that mud of politics?"

"Yes, because I appealed to them as a poet, not as a politician. It was a new candidature, Marquise. I had my rustics all to myself, and never a word did I say to them on the contemptible questions of the hour. Nothing about the bread-tax, believe me. I spoke to them in a hall decorated with banners bearing the names of my works. I told them of the joys of being, as exemplified in those works. Listen: 'Men of my own land, in the solemn stillness of the Sabbath afternoon I would place in the hands—the gnarled and sunburnt hands of the peasant, sitting beneath the oak-tree's shade, instead of a text of Scripture, one of my books.' Did I say well?"

"Magnificent!"

"Then—forgive me if I quote myself—'his cottage of clay, his bread and water, the reaping-songs of his daughters, all these would appear more sacred in his eyes than before.'"

"Sublime!"

"I claimed before them the absolute superiority of the poet."

"Ah!"

"I taught them that, in the existence of a people, a grand manifestation of art is worth more than a treaty of alliance or a tributary law."

"Oh!"

The Marquise.—"Dear Master, we understand you. But, are you sure that they do? What if they felt in their degraded souls that you were condescending to the cant of our time—altruism, pity for the herd?"

The Light.—"Heaven forbid! Never for one single moment. Read my prefaces. What have I ever taught them but that power and craft are laws to themselves! A patrician order of soul has no more duties to its inferiors than it has to the beasts. A religion of love! an ethic of pity for the weak which is nothing but a system of insurance for imbeciles—what have we to do with these? Be strong, be strong!"

Mr. Whiteing's Island, in its new form, will, we trust, find many readers. The popularity of No. 5, John Street must have stimulated curiosity in the author's other work to a very considerable extent on both sides of the Atlantic.

Australia on the War.

COME my hearties—work will stand—

Here's yer Mother calling;

Wants us all to lend a hand,

And go out Uncle-Pauling.

Catch yer nags and saddle slick!

Quick to join the banners!

Folks that treat the fam'ly thick

Must be taught their manners.

—From "A Fam'ly Matter," by Arthur Macquarie, quoted in the "Times."

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE Bishop of Bloemfontein has died at the wrong moment. The representative of the Anglican Church in a diocese that covered the Orange Free State (a name that you shall find no more upon the map of South Africa), and that included Bechuanaland also and Basutoland to boot, he had a territory twice the size of England and Wales under his spiritual rule, and his capital in a city now in arms against England. Bishop John Wale Hicks had encountered difficulties in the past only to overcome them, and his words and acts would have been regarded with singular interest by the large number of friends he left behind him in England, old fellow students of science at London University, of theology at Cambridge, members of the Savile Club and the Athenæum, old parishioners of his during his twenty or so years of service at Little St. Marie's, Cambridge—a church beloved of Crashaw—and fellow-members of the English Church Union.

It was not so much in the later and ecclesiastical half of his life that the Bishop (who has died while still in the fifties) made an amazing record. He was known as a man of many degrees, and somebody said when he went to his South African diocese that, enormous as it was, the letters he was entitled to write after his name would almost reach across it. As others dread examinations, so did he love them. It hardly mattered what the subject might be, if he was a possible candidate he was a certain one; and never was he known to fail. At the age of twenty-one he took his B.A. at London University, gaining the prize for chemistry and animal physiology, with honours in vegetable physiology and structural botany. When he was twenty-two he was also gold medallist in anatomy and physiology, and he took the B.Sc. degree with honours in chemistry, logic, geology, and paleontology. A year later and he had his M.D. degree with a first-class, and gold medal in obstetric medicine. His M.D. degree and his membership of the Royal College of Physicians followed. Then he won a foundation scholarship of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, where in one year he was a Senior Optime in the Mathematical and head of the Natural Science Tripos, following this up with a second-class in the Theological Tripos. A demonstrator of chemistry in the University, he then became a Fellow of Trinity, and, at the age of thirty, a candidate—successful, of course—for holy orders. Then his great interest and occupation in life was, in a manner, gone: he had no more examinations to pass. True, he was one of the examiners for the Natural Science Tripos in 1873 and 1874, and again in 1879 and 1880; and he was examining chaplain to the Bishop of Lincoln from 1885 to 1892; but that was sport—mere umpireship in a contest that did not allow him to compete. A last examination before President Steyn might have been his fate had he lived; but his luck had exhausted itself, and the telegram that told of his death came almost simultaneously with that which announced the war as really begun.

THE Lord Chief Justice of England, lately a stranger to his own bench, paid a brief visit on Tuesday to his rooms at the Law Courts—the first since the sittings of the Venezuelan Boundary Commission began in Paris. With the finding of that Commission Lord Russell is entirely satisfied. It gives to Great Britain, if not so much territory as she formally claims, yet more than she had more than once officially declared her willingness to accept in the interests of peace. Lord Russell therefore regards the finding of the Commission as another triumph, not for arbitration only, but for England also. The opening of the Law Courts in a few weeks will find Lord Russell back again in his familiar place; but for how long? The place left vacant by the death of Lord Herschell in the Alaskan Boundary business has still to be filled. For the moment a working boundary has been decided upon, but for the moment only. Between the United States and Canada and Great Britain a final settlement will have to be made without much longer delay; and it is almost equally a certainty that Lord Russell of Killowen will have to be withdrawn once more from his court to promote our international cause in Washington.

MISS SKENE, whose equestrianism on the Plains of Athens was the admiration of Greeks more than fifty years ago, has died in old age at Oxford, after a very brief illness, which was not only the last, but also nearly the first, of her long life. In her presence Prof. Jowett forgot to be cynical; she knew Landor well; also Sir Richard Church, under whom Byron sought to serve in the Greek war of Independence; but the memory she most cherished was that of her friendship with Sir Walter Scott, who dedicated to her father a canto of "Marmion," and came to his house for consolation when he found himself a ruined man. Taking "his dearie" upon his knee, and telling her fairy stories, he forgot his gloom and laughed out aloud—an experience very similar to that which a living poet has recorded in monumental verse.

LORD FARRER lived long enough to be disillusioned about many things, including the policy of the Progressives on the London County Council, whose chairman he once was. Such modifications of earlier enthusiasm are perhaps proper to age, nor are they hindered by the processes that turned Mr. Farrer of the Board of Trade into Sir Thomas, and Sir Thomas into a peer. In one British institution he never lost his pride—that was the Times newspaper. Admirer as he was of Cobden, he could not share Cobden's reprobation of that paper, a renouncement of it and of its works that had almost the solemnity of a rite of religion. When Mr. Ruskin said that the certain course of personal deterioration was to be found in living in London and reading the Times, Lord Farrer laughed that those were the only two things he really cared to do, and bold would be the man who should accuse him of deterioration. He belonged to a world in which that word had no meaning—he and his Board of Trade, which was his in fact, and only in name the Ministers' at its head. True, the Times was always kind to Lord Farrer; it disagreed, never with him, but only with his opinions. Even to these its large type was always at service during his life; and to his praises after his death. At Balliol, Farrer was the contemporary of the late Mr. Walter and Sir George Dasent, a happy conjunction to which he always attributed one of the happiest phases of his after life.

SIR REDVERS BULLER is a general in favour with War Correspondents, still uneasy in some quarters, under the frowns of General Kitchener at Khartoum. More correspondents altogether have gone out to South Africa than have ever been placed in the field by English editors before: and of these an increased proportion are themselves military men. Mr. Winston Churchill's work in the Morning Post, if it is equal to his Soudan letters, will probably establish his fame in this department of special reporting; and Lord de la Warr, who has gone out for the Globe, has at any rate a name in keeping with his new adventures.

MANY persons will remember a work on Charles Dickens written by his secretary on his American tour, Mr. Dolby. It was, if we are not mistaken, entitled With Charles Dickens in America. We regret to say that Mr. Dolby is now lying ill in a London hospital.

Correspondence.

"Travestying Herbert Spencer."

SIR,—In the article entitled "Travestying Herbert Spencer," which appears in your last issue, the reviewer complains that by quoting a portion of a letter from Darwin to John Fiske, referring to Mr. Herbert Spencer, I have left the readers of Naturalism and Agnosticism "to infer that this was Darwin's first and last verdict about Spencer." The reviewer further urges that I might have appealed "from Darwin knowing little to Darwin knowing a great deal more." So doing, he says, I should have come across the "memorable letter in which, addressing Spencer, Darwin states: 'Everyone . . . ought to bow the knee to you, and I for one do.'" On looking up the letters I find that this, which is supposed to emanate from "Darwin knowing much," is the earlier of the two, bearing the date June 10, 1872. Moreover, the immediate cause of the "unbounded admiration" here expressed was merely an article by Mr. Spencer in the Contemporary Review replying to certain strictures of Dr. Martineau on Evolution, a case in which Darwin and Mr. Spencer had common ground. The letter I quoted, and which your reviewer seems to imply came from "Darwin knowing little," is dated December 8, 1874, and seems, as a matter of fact, to have been his "last verdict about Spencer." Also, this verdict was given apropos of Fiske's Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy, which is substantially a presentment of Mr. Spencer's system as a whole.—I am, &c., JAMES WARD.

Trin. Coll., Camb.: October 17, 1899.

The Split Infinitive.

SIR,—If the contents of this letter have not been anticipated by anyone else, may I point out in your columns that the reason why it is grammatically inadmissible to split an infinitive is twofold: (1) because an infinitive, though expressed in our language by two or, in the passive mood and past tense, by more than two words, is one in principle and intent, as is demonstrated by analogy of the Latin—e.g., vivere = "to live," and vixisse = "to have lived"; and (2) because the infinitive is practically substantive, and as such is moreover capable of being governed by a preposition, a fact which is instilled into every public school boy who, Greek verb card in hand, has to commit to memory the quotation:

For not to have been dipped in Lethe's stream
Could save the son of Thetis from to die.

Here "to have been dipped" is but one idea, identical with the substantive "immersion," in the nominative case; while "from to die" is equivalent to "from death," a substantive governed by a preposition.

To gather together from standard writers any amount of instances of a split infinitive does not prove that wrong is right, but only that the greatest and best of mortals are not exempt from occasional mistakes.—I am, &c.,

October 16, 1899.

AYMER VALLANCE.

"David Harum."

SIR,—An American is often amused to see the laboured attempts recently made in England and America to account for the immense popularity of the story called David Harum.

David Harum may not be a very great work—nor do I myself so consider it—but it is one of the distressingly few books which of late years have managed to hold up a true American mirror to true American nature.

The original "David" I did not know in the flesh. But his twin brother (in Northern New Jersey) has been my trusty and intimate friend for many long moons.

I am a country Catholic priest, and, like most men of my kind, have urgent need of a first-class road-horse. My roadsters old David's twin brother does me the honour to buy for me. And you may wager your last dollar that the horses so bought are entirely sound in wind and in limb. Nor are they, I can assure you, given to the fatal habit of stopping before time has been called.

I have read David Harum with infinite delight. With others it may have been otherwise.—I am, &c.,

JOHN BAXTER.

St. Mary's Hospital, Passaic, New Jersey:

October 10, 1899.

Misconceptions.

SIR,—May I add another to your store of "misconceptions"? I can remember how my young brain used to be troubled with the problem: Why could not the rich man dip his own finger into the great gulf fixed between him and Lazarus?—I am, &c.,

October 16, 1899.

C. E. H.

SIR,—I see that none of your correspondents has so far touched on the Shorter Catechism as a field with an abundant harvest of childish misconceptions. They begin with the first question: "What is man's chifend?"—chief end would take too much time to say in the system of cram-by-rote which has misrepresented education for so long. And how a "chifend," which most of us took for a piece of furniture (modelled on chiffonier), could "glorify God and enjoy Him for ever" caused us many a sleepless night. "Reasonsannexed" to the different Commandments had a vague existence in the form of some wild beast of a striped kind—the x probably linking it to the z of zebra.

Apart from the humorous, there is a really tragic side to this matter. Why stuff a child's memory with parrot-phrases only to be unlearned later with tears over time wasted which might have gone to the training of observation? Was it Aristotle who said: "In a multitude of facts is the rout of thought"?—I am, &c.,

Our Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 4.

WE asked last week for lists of twenty books suitable to stand on the shelves of a country inn. The response has been heavy. For the most part our contributors have made lists of well-known works of some length, a specimen or so of which will be found below; but it seems to us an inn library is much better furnished with books whose interest is fragmentary. One does not want, at an inn, to embark upon long stories, although to dip here and there in such stories as one must already have read—Pickwick, for example—is agreeable enough. We have decided to award the prize to Mr. E. Bond, The Rookery, Eye, Suffolk, for the following list:

Competition No. 5. (New Series.)

We offer a prize of one guinea to the best translation, following the original metre and rhyme scheme, of the following poem by Heine:

ES STEHEN UNBEWEGLICH.

Es stehen unbeweglich
Die Sterne in der Höh'
Viel tausend Jahr', und schauen
Sich an mit Liebesweh.

Sie sprechen eine Sprache,
Die ist so reich, so schön;
Doch keiner der Philologen
Kann diese Sprache verstehn.

Ich aber hab' sie gelernt,
Und ich vergesse sie nicht;
Mir diene als Grammatik
Der Herzzallerliebsten Gesicht.

Delivered before the University of Aberdeen, in the Years 1896-98.

By JAMES WARD, Sc.D., Hon. LL.D., Edin., Professor of Mental Philosophy and Logic in the University of Cambridge.

"A work which does much to redeem Cambridge as a centre of philosophical thought, and which, if we mistake not, will prove one of the most important contributions to philosophy made in our time in England. .... Indeed, we are unable to think of any English work in which so complete a grasp both of science and philosophy is shown as in this remarkable treatise. .... If the Gifford bequest had given us this work only, its donor would have laid us under lasting obligations."—The Spectator.

"It cannot be doubted that it will have a wide influence on the higher thought of the country, and may even do something to restore to philosophy the prominent place it once occupied in English thought."—The Athenæum.

The Literary Week.

ELSEWHERE we speak of the late Mr. Grant Allen, but we may here quote the short poem which he printed three or four years ago in his Lower Slopes. Among the poetry of Agnosticism it takes a high place:

A crowned Caprice is god of this world;
On his stony breast are his white wings furred.
No ear to listen, no eye to see,
No heart to feel for a man hath he.

But his pitiless arm is swift to smite;
And his mute lips utter one word of might;
'Mid the clash of gentler souls and rougher,
"Wrong must thou do, or wrong must suffer."

Then grant, oh dumb blind god, at least that we Rather the sufferers than the doers be.

One who knew Mr. Grant Allen as well as any writes to us: "The one note of his life I can swear to was his absolute sincerity and honesty in all those opinions that people have suggested he adopted for the sake of attracting attention."

THOSE persons who read two very entertaining and vivacious stories The Typewriter Girl and Rosalba, published by Messrs. Pearson, and written nominally by Olive Pratt Rayner, will have further idea of Mr. Grant Allen's fecundity of invention, for Olive Pratt Rayner and Mr. Grant Allen were one and the same. Even professional critics were taken in by the pseudonym. One of them even went so far as to urge upon Mr. Grant Richards, his regular publisher (who was in the secret, but did not show any signs of it) the value of getting Miss Rayner, if possible, to write a story for him. Rosalba, the history of a very engaging young Italian variety artiste, is one of Mr. Grant Allen's most brilliant efforts in fiction.

MR. JOHN LANE's appeal against Mr. Justice North's decision in the Walter (The Times) v. Lane case will be heard on Monday. Mr. Lane will be represented by Mr. Augustine Birrell and Mr. Scrutton, the counsel chosen by the Publishers' Association, who have taken up the matter. Mr. Birrell's studies for his recent work on the law of copyright have caused him to take the strongest interest in the case.

OWING to a breakdown of health Mr. Pett Ridge has been compelled, by doctors' orders, to give up the work in the City which he has hitherto carried on concurrently with the production of his stories and sketches. Henceforward he will give to writing alone such energy as he is permitted to exert.

MR. W. D. HOWELLS, after refusing for many years to mount the lecture platform, has at last consented, and is now beginning a course of fifty lectures in various towns in the States. Mr. Howells's subjects are "Novels and Novel-writing" and "Heroes and Heroines of Fiction," and he will occasionally interpolate readings from his own works. The demand for seats is said to be very great. Mr. Cable has also prepared two lectures for the season which is now starting, but his subjects are more serious and less literary than Mr. Howells's. One is "My Vote and my Conscience," and the other "How to Study the Bible."

THE war has been accused of exercising a prejudicial influence on publishers' activities. The fact that we have received this week no fewer than thirty-six new novels proves that, so far as stories go, at any rate, the allegation is groundless.

WITH the issue of the seventh and eighth volumes of his great work, Italy and Her Invaders, Dr. Thomas Hodgkin sees the completion of a task which has occupied his leisure for twenty-five years. Dr. Hodgkin, like Sir John Lubbock and the poet Rogers, is a banker. He is a member of the firm of Hodgkin, Barnett, Spence, Pease & Co., of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and is also a leading member of the Society of Friends. His long study of ancient warfare thus goes hand-in-hand with a love of "peace in our time." Dr. Hodgkin has for some years been the tenant, under Lord Armstrong, of Bamborough Castle, that magnificent Saxon fortress on the iron coast of Northumberland, and here, we believe, many pages of his great work have been written. Concurrently with this history, Dr. Hodgkin has written many papers on theological and archaeological subjects.

DR. THOMAS HODGKIN.

From a Photograph by Elliot & Fry.

IN the new North American Review, Ian Maclaren writes of the restless energy of the American people, and incidentally mentions an American friend who spoke to him thus concerning the Holy Land: "They may say what they like about Jerusalem, but it's a back number. As I am a white man, there's not a trolley-car nor a daily newspaper in the whole place. What Jerusalem wants is a few hustlers from the West. I guess they would show the old place a razzle-dazzle." We have here another instance of fact following fiction, for some years before, in The Naulakha, Mr. Kipling (or Mr. Wolcott Balestier) had made a Colorado American remark of India: "They've got resources enough. It isn't as if they had the excuse that the country's poor. It's a good country. Move the population of a lively Colorado town to Rhatore, set up a good local paper, organise a board of trade, and let the world know what is here, and we'd have a boom in six months that would shake the empire. But what's the use? They're dead. They're mummies. They're wooden images. There isn't enough real, old-fashioned, downright rustle and razzle-dazzle, and 'git up and git' in Gokral Seetaram to run a milk-cart."

IN the same periodical is an article by M. de Blowitz on the French Press and the Dreyfus case, set up from cablegram. Therein the correspondent of the Times vividly describes the extraordinary license of free speech and false speech which is permitted to the Paris journalist. This is a ghastly picture of the fate in store for any man who takes his case into a court of law:

But what is certain is that the Press now has absolute impunity, and that nothing can henceforth deprive it of this impunity. Whoever endeavours to escape from it, in the tempest it raises, is sure to perish, body and soul. It is before the assizes that a person defamed is obliged to cite the journal that attacks him. Nearly always, those who have no profession obliging them to undertake the struggle, hesitate at the idea of appearing at the assizes. Several days before the trial begins, the journal that is prosecuted publishes the list of jurymen; and when its adversary, already terrified by the solemn surroundings, appears in court, it terrifies the jury that is to pronounce the verdict. It is very rare for a private person to undertake such a combat, still more rare to see a judge who dares brave a journal to protect a citizen, so that the latter, condemned by the acquittal of the journal, leaves the court room slandered and insulted, first of all by the journalist, and secondly, dishonoured by the verdict of the jury.

M. DE BLOWITZ' description of the various papers is extremely interesting and informing. He delivers his judgments unsparingly, reserving the worst condemnation of all for La Croix. Thus:

I have left, by repugnance rather than by oversight, for the end of this study the most abominable, not of French journals, but of all the journals published in the French language—I mean that poisoned vaseline which is called La Croix, and which softly slips under the skin and there deposits the virus of hypocrisy, deadly insinuations and denunciations. La Croix has at the top of its first page the image of Christ crucified; and in each number, in fact, it crucifies anew, on its very threshold, by its abominable prose, the gentle Saviour who chased the money-changers from the Temple. Each day it stirred up hatred against the unfortunate prisoner at Devil's Island, and rendered suspicious even the pity which it preached in his favour, when the revolt of all hearts had shown the horror of the new condemnation. It is an abominable journal, trying to supplant all other popular publications, and to dry up the pure blood of the French nation. It is an abominable journal, and the Catholic Church must be powerfully rooted in French hearts to resist such an ally.

La Croix, however, has just met with a satisfactory reverse, for Monsignor Turinaz has not only denounced it for certain scurrilous irreverence, but has even appealed to Rome on the matter.

AN American correspondent informs us that the Poe Memorial Association of the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, on October 7, unveiled Zolnay's bust of the poet. This ceremony occurred in the library on the fiftieth anniversary of Poe's death. Two meetings were devoted to the occasion. In the morning, Dr. C. W. Kent, president of the Association, presented the bust, and it was officially received by the university. Letters were read from fully one hundred literary men and women all over the country, and the gathering was a notable one.

WE stated last week that a translation of M. Zola's Fécondité was about to be published under the title "Fruitfulness." But a hitch has occurred, and possibly not for a long time will there be any such book. Mr. E. A. Vizetelly, who is M. Zola's authorised translator, has withdrawn from the task of giving the book an English form. We quote from the Athenaeum a portion of Mr. Vizetelly's letter on the subject:

I have not translated Fécondité because, in my humble opinion, an adequate translation of the book is an impossibility. I have studied the French text with great care, and hold that, in the present state of English opinion—prejudice, hypocrisy, call it what you will—no English publisher of repute would care to issue anything approaching a verbatim rendering of the book. Such issue, in my estimation, would be inevitably followed by controversy of the most unpleasant kind, and a prosecution might well ensue. So far as I am concerned, there are peremptory private reasons why I should do nothing to revive scandal such as followed the publication by my father of certain of M. Zola's former works, notably La Terre. I admired La Terre, and I admire Fécondité, which deals, to my thinking, in a masterly fashion with a crying evil. But although some may argue that English fiction has "moved" since the days of La Terre, and that certain outspokenness, then so universally censured, has now largely become permissible, I consider such a degree of outspokenness as distinguishes Fécondité to be still far in advance of us. At all events, whether that be the case or not, I cannot in my position—having given hostages to fortune, having been involved in the ruin which overtook my father, and having then had to begin my life afresh—I cannot undertake, even in the more than doubtful case of publishers being willing, to fight, or help to fight, the battle which the publication of a faithful English rendering of Fécondité would, in my estimation, entail.

Mr. Vizetelly wishes it to be clearly understood that there has been no quarrel whatever between either M. Zola or Messrs. Chatto & Windus and himself.

THE Laureate of the Times' advertisement columns, Mrs. Oakley, who is also an honorary Vice-President of the Navy League, contributed to Saturday's Times some verses for Trafalgar Day. Mrs. Oakley has not mastered the technique of poesy, but her sentiments are admirable, and she deserves public thanks for a patriotism which must be a source of considerable expense to her. It was held admirable in Mr. Kipling to take no money for his national rallies and to mark them non-copyright, but to pay for the publication of patriotic verse is a step farther.

WE have been handed the following letter addressed by a working novelist to a private friend: "I shall feel greatly obliged if, on receiving this, you will at once call together an assembly of the most suitable and skilled Englishmen and direct them to supply at once certain dangerous deficiencies of the English language. I require myself—within the next fortnight—a word to be coined like unto the French 'on.' The word 'one' I reject. I also require a concrete opposite for the words 'friendship' and 'friendships.'" Perhaps some of our readers will offer suggestions.

In her introduction to Jane Eyre, which we notice elsewhere, Mrs. Humphry Ward quotes Mr. Rochester's remark, "Young lady, I am disposed to be gregarious and communicative to-night," as an absurdity. "Not even Mr. Rawchester," she says, "could exceed this. Parody has nothing to add." The misprint is unfortunate, for the hero of "Miss Mix," in Mr. Bret Harte's Sensation Novels, is not Rawchester, but Rawjester—a name of subtle meaning. It will be remembered that, just as Miss Mix was beginning her eighth cup of tea, a man leaped through the window into the room:

The crash startled me from my self-control. The house-keeper bent toward me and whispered:

"Don't be excited. It's Mr. Rawjester—he prefers to come in sometimes in this way. It's his playfulness, ha! ha! ha!"

"I perceive," I said calmly. "It's the unfettered impulse of a lofty soul breaking the tyrannising bonds of custom," and I turned toward him.

He had never once looked at me. He stood with his back to the fire, which set off the herculean breadth of his shoulders. His face was dark and expressive; his under-jaw squarely formed, and remarkably heavy. I was struck with his remarkable likeness to a Gorilla.

As he absently tied the poker into hard knots with his nervous fingers, I watched him with some interest. Suddenly he turned toward me:

"Do you think I'm handsome, young woman?"

"Not classically beautiful," I returned calmly; "but you have, if I may so express myself, an abstract manliness—a sincere and wholesome barbarity which, involving as it does the naturalness"—but I stopped, for he yawned at that moment—an action which singularly developed the immense breadth of his lower jaw—and I saw he had forgotten me. Presently he turned to the housekeeper:

"Leave us."

The old woman withdrew with a courtesy.

Mr. Rawjester deliberately turned his back upon me and remained silent for twenty minutes. I drew my shawl the more closely around my shoulders and closed my eyes.

"You are the governess?" at length he said.

"I am, sir."

"A creature who teaches geography, arithmetic, and the use of the globes—ha!—a wretched remnant of femininity—a skimp pattern of girlhood with a premature flavour of tea-leaves and morality. Ugh!"

I bowed my head silently.

TURNING over the pages of Mr. Bret Harte's perfect travesties, we come again upon Victor Hugo. Readers of the Memoirs of Victor Hugo, which are noticed on another page of this number, will know how excellent is this passage from the American humorist's "Fantine":

Love is a mystery.

A little friend of mine down in the country, at Auvergne, said to me one day: "Victor, Love is the world—it contains everything."

She was only sixteen, this sharp-witted little girl, and a beautiful blonde. She thought everything of me.

Fantine was one of those women who do wrong in the most virtuous and touching manner. This is a peculiarity of French grisettes.

You are an Englishman, and you don't understand. Learn, my friend, learn. Come to Paris and improve your morals.

Fantine was the soul of modesty. She always wore high-neck dresses. High-neck dresses are a sign of modesty.

Fantine loved Thomolyes. Why? My God! What are you to do? It was the fault of her parents, and she hadn't any. How shall you teach her? You must teach the parent if you wish to educate the child. How would you become virtuous?

Teach your grandmother!

Mr. Bret Harte's jeu d'esprit wears wonderfully.

MR. LANG's new volume for children, The Red Book of Animal Stories, is dedicated very prettily to Miss Sybil Corbet, the little lady whose Animal Land and Sybil's Garden of Pleasant Delights are already known to curious readers. These are Mr. Lang's verses:

Sybil, the Beasts we bring to you
Are not so friendly, not so odd,
As those that all amazed we view.
The brutes created by your nod—
The Wuss, the Azorkon, and the Pod;
But then our tales are true!

Fauna of fancy, one and all
Obey your happy voice, we know;
A garden zoological
Is all around, where'er you go.
Mellys and Kanks walk to and fro,
And Dids attend your call.

We have but common wolves and bears,
Lion and leopard, hawk and hind,
Tigers and crocodiles and hares:
But yet they hope you will be kind,
And mark with sympathetic mind
These moving tales of theirs.

Mr. Lang's preface to his new volume closes thus:

If this book has any moral at all, it is to be kind to all sorts and conditions of animals—that will let you. Most girls are ready to do this, but boys used to be apt to be unkind to Cats when I was a boy. There is no reason why an exception should be made as to Cats, and a boy ought to think of this before he throws stones or sets dogs at a cat. Now, in London, we often see the little street boys making friends with every cat they meet, but this is not so common in the country. If anything in this book amuses a boy, let him be kind to poor puss, and protect her, for the sake of his obedient friend,

ANDREW LANG.

MR. QUILLER-COUCH, to whom, by the way, Mr. Shan F. Bullock's new novel is dedicated, has inscribed his latest romance, The Ship of Stars, to Mr. Leonard Courtney, M.P., in the following letter:

It is with a peculiar pleasure and, I dare to hope, with some appropriateness that I dedicate to you this story of the West Country, which claims you with pride. To be sure, the places here written of will be found in no map of your own or any neighbouring constituency. A visitor may discover Nannizabuloe, but only to wonder what has become of the lighthouse, or seek along the sand-hills without hitting on Tredinnis. Yet much of the tale is true in a fashion, even to fact. One or two things which happen to Sir Harry Vyell did actually happen to a better man, who lived and hunted foxes not a hundred miles from the "model borough" of Liskeard, and are told of him in my friend Mr. W. F. Collier's memoir of Harry Terrell, a bygone Dartmoor hero: a true account of what followed the wreck of the Samaritan will be found in a chapter of Remembrances by that true poet and large-hearted man, Robert Stephen Hawker.

But a novel ought to be true to more than fact: and if this one come near its aim, no one will need to be told why I dedicate it to you. If it do not (and I wish the chance could be despised!), its author will yet hold that among the names of living Englishmen he could have chosen none fitter to be inscribed above a story which in the telling has insensibly come to rest upon the two texts, "Lord, make men as towers!" and "All towers carry a light." Although for you Heaven has seen fit to darken the light, believe me it shines outwards over the waters and is a help to men: a guiding light tended by brave hands. We pray, sir—we who sail in little boats—for long life to the tower and the unfaltering lamp.

The allusion to the darkening of the light in Mr. Courtney's case is a reference to the unhappy weakness of sight from which that gentleman has been suffering.

THE new volume of Adventures of Captain Kettle, the Further Adventures of Captain Kettle, to which we shall return another week, contains a delightful letter from

Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne's fascinating hero to the German Emperor. Circumstances led the Kaiser to present the captain with his portrait and a watch. The Captain returned the watch and with it sent this missive:

To His Majesty the German Emperor.
Berlin, SS. Flamingo,
Germany. Liverpool.

SIR,

I am in receipt of watch sent by your agent, the German ambassador in London, which I return herewith. It is not my custom to accept presents from people I don't know, especially if I have talked about them. I have talked about you, not liking several things you've done, especially telegraphing about Dr. Jameson. Sir, you should remember that man was down when you sent your wire and couldn't hit back. Some of the things I have said about German deck hands you needn't take too much notice about. They aren't so bad as they might be if properly handled. But they want handling. Likewise learning English.

My wife wants to keep your photo, so I send you one of hers in return, so there shall be no robbery. She has written her name over it, same as yours.

Yours truly,
O. Kettle (Master).

New humorists are always acceptable, and we are therefore glad to learn that Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. have secured one. He comes—we almost said, of course—from America, his name is Mr. George Horton, and his book is called A Fair Brigand. Before publication, however, in volume form, it will run through the Gentlewoman.

CONCERNING a recent review in our columns of the Art of Thinking, a book by Mr. Sharper Knowlson, the author writes that we erred in stating that his purpose was to "teach the art of thought to anyone." His aim, on the contrary, he informs us, is merely to instruct beginners.

ANOTHER objection to a review comes from Mr. Hamish Stuart, the author of Lochs and Loch-Fishing, which was noticed last week. Mr. Stuart complains wholly of our attitude to his work. We can only say that we know our reviewer to be a good fisherman and a practised man of letters; and if he had difficulty in catching Mr. Stuart's meaning, there must be something wrong in Mr. Stuart's style, our examples from which were quite typical.

Bibliographical.

THE possessors of Mr. Swinburne's later volumes will, I fear, take it as rather unkind of Messrs. Chatto & Windus that Rosamund is sent out in a yellow binding with bevelled edges. Why was it not allowed to range with its immediate predecessors? There are already signs that the reviewers have been dipping into Davenant's Albiovine (published in 1629), in which the writer dealt, though in a very different way, with the subject taken up by Mr. Swinburne. Genest, by a curious slip, describes Albiovine as a tragedy in prose; it is, of course, in verse. There is no record of it ever having been acted.

The gentleman who, greatly daring, wrote recently the biography of Mr. Kipling is, it seems, to undertake the same thing, for the same series of books, in regard to Mr. Swinburne. One does not envy him the task. No living writer has more persistently hid himself from the biographer than Mr. Swinburne, who has never willingly been interviewed, and certainly has never permitted himself to be photographed at his desk, after the fashion of more accommodating men of letters. No doubt an industrious reader of contemporary memoirs, autobiographies, and so forth, could piece together an account of Mr. Swinburne which might have attractions for the consumers of unconsidered trifles. There are glimpses of the poet in many works of this sort, but they would go to the making of a very fragmentary narrative.

In the series to which I refer Mr. T. Edgar Pemberton is to supply the biography of Mr. Bret Harte. To Mr. Pemberton we already owe a memoir of Mr. John Hare, the actor, and he is said to have written, or to be writing, the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Kendal. The monograph on Mr. Pinero will be from the pen of Mr. Hamilton Fyffe, who has on more than one occasion shown himself specially interested in things theatrical. But surely the biography, if it was to be done at all, would have been particularly safe in the hands of Mr. Malcolm Salaman, who has edited and "introduced" so many of Mr. Pinero's plays, and quite lately published a sketch of him in his habit as he lives at home.

The announcement that Miss Braddon is to publish through Messrs. Downey & Co. reminds one that of late years the lady has practically been her own publisher. For a long period her books were issued by the firm of W. & R. Maxwell, of which her husband was the head. In 1887 Mr. Stephen Blackett published her Like and Dislike, but from that date till last year her stories bore the imprimatur of Simpkin, Marshall & Co., the great distributors. Last year Messrs. Hutchinson were the publishers of her In High Places, but with her new book, His Darling Sin, there is a return to Messrs. Simpkin.

A new translation of the Black Tulip of Dumas has been undertaken by Mr. Adair Fitzgerald, in spite of the fact that a version was put on the market by Messrs. Dent only a few years ago. Mr. Fitzgerald's translation has, however, the merit of being the cheaper. It should always be remembered to the advantage of the stage that it often adds to the vogue of literary works. To that extent (and to that extent only) the dramatising of novels may be defended by the lovers of literature.

I agree with Mr. G. F. Engelbach: no published book should be without a "gilt top"—that is to say, no book for which permanency is hoped. There are very many publications—such as the average six-shilling novel—on which gilt tops would obviously be wasted. But when publishers do not endow their books with gilt tops they imply, practically, that those works are not intended for preservation. It would be a good thing, perhaps, to make this one of the standards, or assumptions, in book-reviewing.

There should be a field for the forthcoming illustrated edition of Le Sage's Asmodeus. It would seem that we have not had an "illuminated" translation of the work since Mr. Nimmo brought out, in 1881, the version with etchings by De Los Rios.

In giving us an English Life of Benvenuto Cellini, the author of The Life of Kenelm Digby (who still elects to remain anonymous) will at least be presenting us with something which (if I remember aright) we do not possess already. There have been, of course, several translations of Cellini's autobiography, the latest and best of which—that by J. Addington Symonds—first published in 1888, has run through several editions. Those of Nugent (1771) and Roscoe (1822) have been quite superseded by Symonds'. But a handy and adequate biography of Cellini in English is yet to seek, and we can only hope that it will be supplied in the forthcoming volume.

The account of Robert Browning which Mr. Waugh is to contribute to the "Westminster" series of biographies will be welcome, notwithstanding the existence of the monograph by Mr. Sharp in the "Great Writers" series. Since Mr. Sharp wrote, we have had the biography (by no means satisfactory) of Mrs. Orr, and, above all, the letters of Mr. and Mrs. Browning. Of all these Mr. Waugh may be trusted to make good use. We all remember how successful he was in his Life of Tennyson, hampered though he was by the absence of help from the poet or his family.

The Anatomy of Scotland.

The Social Life of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century. By Henry Grey Graham. 2 vols. (Black. 24s.)

THE social life of England in the eighteenth century is one of the most open, legible, and amusing books in the history of man. But Scotland? The change of name is a change from light to darkness. What does the average Englishman know of this subject? Almost nothing. Whereas the London of Queen Anne's day is warm, bright, and minutely visible, peopled by men whose very wigs and snuff-boxes we know, Edinburgh and Glasgow are still waiting in outer gloom. How can it be otherwise, since the Londoners of that day thought more of a journey to Edinburgh than now we do of a run to Omdurman. The few who had crossed the Border were eloquent of nothing but the hardships they had suffered in a land of bleak moors and execrable inns. The Scottish hills were terrible to travellers who, with Pope, could shudder at the "sable wastes" that diversified Windsor Park. The Dumfriesshire hills were described as "hideous," and the colour of the Highland mountains was "dismal brown" or "dirty purple." Goldsmith said that, in Scotland, "hills and rocks intercept every prospect"; which was like Goldsmith. Blind to Scotland's beauty, Englishmen were not blind to her defects: her lack of culture and her poverty. No wonder they stayed in England. The Union was a loveless marriage, the husband vowing to cherish a wife whom he had never wooed.

Still, one thinks of three Englishmen whose visits to Scotland in the eighteenth century were embassies of love. First, there was Defoe, who went to Edinburgh, as the agent of Harley, to promote the nuptials of 1708. Defoe had the Union at heart; he was its pamphleteer, diplomatist, and historian. Second came Gray, who opened blind eyes to the grandeur of the Highlands. "The mountains," he wrote in 1765, "were ecstatic, and ought to be visited once a year. None but these monstrous children of God know how to join so much beauty with so much horror." The third pioneer was the burly Doctor, who in 1773 carried the pageant of his learning to Iona, and jeered at most things on the way; yet was he sure that he would not have lost the memory of his journey for five hundred pounds. It is not irrelevant to add that whereas Defoe rode to Edinburgh on horseback, Johnson travelled by swift post-chaises.

On the Scotland thus gingerly trodden and slenderly known to Englishmen of the last century Mr. Graham lifts the curtain. At once we must pay our tribute to the skilful industry with which he has surveyed, collected, and sifted a vast amount of material. We must then add that the finished product of his pen is a clear, graceful, and deeply interesting work. Opinions will differ, perhaps, as to the proportion of space allotted to various sections of the subject. We fancy that the sketch of the "Progress of Industry and Trade" might have been lengthened with advantage. It is a little curious that in detailing the rise of the Scottish linen manufacturers Mr. Graham gives no credit to Defoe, who claimed to have preached the profitableness of the trade to his Edinburgh friends, and to have set over a hundred families to work. He also introduced new ideas and methods into the Coal and Salt trades. Moreover, his advocacy of the Union was largely based on his conviction that this drawing together of the two nations would immensely benefit Scottish trade. But we mention this lightly, and by the way. Mr. Graham's book is a difficult one to criticise; it is a delightful one to explore. Even exploration is not easy where the paths are so many.

Our first glimpses are directed to the country life of Scotland in the early days of the Union, when a poor and proud gentry were just beginning to drink tea and adorn their rooms with wall-paper, and wear linen next the skin. Nothing in this portion of Mr. Graham's work is more fascinating than his sketches of an indigent aristocracy. Ladies of rank wore homespun or bought country-woven material, and ordered stuff gowns from Musselburgh, ready made, at the cost of eight shillings each. Their husbands went about in homespun, and wore woollen shirts, infrequently washed. Drummond of Blair complained that his son had learned little in his travels abroad but "to cast a sark every day." And Mrs. Calderwood, of Poynton, wittily remarked that the way to make a young man despise all things in the spirit of the old philosophies was to send him abroad to despise the Continent and bring him back to despise his native land. It was about the year 1730 that young Scots bloods and scholiasts, fresh from Leyden and Utrecht, began to display Holland shirts, red stockings, and velvet cloaks. Nevertheless, the flow of fashions remained sluggish in the extreme, and young ladies had but one silk gown, which lasted years. In 1720 there was but one milliner in Edinburgh. Within-doors girls were brought up under iron discipline. The first duty of parents was to disseminate their love to their children. Said Lady Strange—making an ordinary tea-table boast—"My children from the youngest to the eldest loves me and fears me as sinners dread death. My look is law." Such Scottish matrons were admirably consistent creatures. They sat bolt upright in straight-backed chairs, took snuff with dignity, swore at their coachmen, and said improper things with propriety. They read the novels of Aphra Behn. But for all this they were unimpeachable, and never threw off the discipline they had received under "the Honourable Mrs. Ogilvie, that sister-in-law of Lord Seafield whose boarding-school was the pink of feminine perfection." Did poverty come? These starched, stomached ladies fought it with equal courage and dignity. Lady Lovat sold stays. Lady Balgarran of Balgarran sold threads at fivepence to six shillings an ounce. Dowager ladies kept up their state with one maid on fourth floors in narrow wynds of Edinburgh. The sons of gentlemen were content to deal in Tay pearls or measure shalloons at the counter. There were innkeepers who quoted Horace, and gentlemen of pedigree who bargained away their black cattle to English graziers at Crieff Trysts.

Even in Edinburgh the best families lived in a kind of genteel squalor in their high, cramped flats. A high-class mansion would have six rooms, including the kitchen and the indispensable praying-closet. One servant, or two at the most, served a family on 15s. a year and a gown. On the long, dirty stairs, countesses, judges, barbers, dancing masters, and fish-wives panted up and down, while the ladies' hoops crackled in the dark. A busy, stewing life! The city awoke at five in the morning. Breakfast—"a substantial meal of mutton, collops, and fowl, with libations of ale, sack, claret, or brandy," tea being used only after 1730—was served at eight o'clock. At half-past eleven St. Giles's bells played hymn tunes, and every tradesman went to his tavern to take his "meridian"—a gill of brandy or a tin of ale. Houses and shops being small, bargains were sealed at tavern tables, and the prospering tradesman grew rich and drunk by one process. The population was packed perpendicularly in the lofty flats, so that the streets always seemed full of people in the busy hours. Mr. Graham describes the noonday scene:

... There were stately old ladies, with their pattens on feet and canes in hand, walking with precision and dignity; judges with their wigs on head and hats under their arm; advocates in their gowns on way to the courts in Parliament House; ministers in their blue or gray coats, bands, wigs, and three-cornered hats. At the Cross (near St. Giles's) the merchants assembled to transact business, and to exchange news and snuff-boxes; while physicians, lawyers, and men about town met them as at an open-air club, and joined citizens in the gossip of the city. In the town there was a fine camaraderie—the friendliness and familiarity of a place where everyone knew everybody.

At night the taverns seethed with ribald festivity, lords and judges taking their "crum o' tripe, twa three peas, and bit lug o' haddock" in the dingiest retreats under, or far back from, the street. At ten o'clock the tattoo of drums in the Canongate warned everyone to go home, but obedience to this rule slackened, and magistrates and roués drank into the small hours.

As time went on, and the formal link with England became warm and real, a new set of pleasures came between the church and the tavern. Books and plays and music struggled into popularity. In 1715 Tony Ashton arrived from London and played the comedies of Congreve and Wycherley. Twenty years later Allan Ramsay built a playhouse in Carubber's-close. Ministers met and banned the stage as a seminary of vice, though they had no word against cock-fighting. Concerts and dancing assemblies became more and more frequent, and in the mid-century ladies and gentlemen danced solemn minuets under the eye of Miss Nicky Murray in the Assembly Room in the High-street. Miss Nicky selected partners for every one, and waved her fan on the stroke of eleven, when the gentlemen took their partners to their flats, and returned to an adjacent tavern to toast the sex until they had themselves to be conducted home. At the Cross Keys tavern fashionable "consorts" were given, and lovely ladies listened while lairds fiddled, and "went into raptures as my Lords Colvil and Haddington sat down to the harpsichord or the 'cello."

The songs of the country, too, were not neglected either at these public reunions or tea-parties in the flats, to which the sedan-chairs bore their be-hooped, be-powdered occupants, when they partook of fare as simple as the airs they sang. Without accompaniment, each vocalist in turn sang those songs—now plaintive, now merry, sad, humorous, or lilting—and many a party was moved to tears at charming strains which told of the artificial woes of a Strephon or a Chloe, or the humbler griefs and loves of a Maggie or Jenny, redolent of the lyre. Cards lost their attraction to silk-coated beaux when Scots melodies, old and yet ever fresh, were poured forth. It was to suit this taste that Allan Ramsay published, in 1724, his Tea-Table Miscellany, in which the familiar tunes were retained to familiar words, or set to verses which were made more clean to suit a more modest age. But in truth, though he had lengthened the skirts of the "high-kilted muse" to fit her for the drawing-room, he had not done enough; and it shows that the period was one which allowed for expression and allusions, and wanton themes and words, which might well have made the fair singer blush.

Meanwhile trade increased, books multiplied, and the good old Scots vernacular was deemed uncouth in life and inconvenient in literature. Judges, divines, and gentlemen took lessons, in 1761, in English from Sheridan, the actor, who drilled them in accents in Carubber's-wynd. By 1773 Johnson was able to say to Boswell: "Sir, your pronunciation is not often disagreeable."

It is, however, in Mr. Graham's chapters on "Religious and Ecclesiastical Life" that we reach the marrow of Scotland in the last century. The Presbyterian triumph after the landing of William of Orange was complete, and Scotland was soon in the grip of the most tyrannical body of clergy, elders, and deacons that ever tried to drive a nation to heaven through a wicket-gate of doctrine. The rigour of church life in the early part of the century is awful to contemplate. The preaching was stupendous. When Mr. Thomas Boston became minister of Simprin he began by preaching a series of sermons on man's natural depravity: these lasted a year. Then he preached on Christ as the remedy, for another year; then on the application of the remedy, for thirteen months; and, finally, on the Four-fold State, he furnished a five years' course of sermons. He once preached a hundred sermons on one text, which he said "afforded us many a sweet hour together." Sometimes tired nature refused him words and ideas, whereat he wept bitterly, saying that his "frame was gone." With a renewal of strength he would record: "This day I had a sweet while in confidence in the Lord, grasping the Promise over the belly of felt foolishness." None but fervent preaching was acceptable to the people. At the great open-air "occasions" two kinds of preachers were recognised. There were yuill (ale) ministers whose dry and "legal" sermons dispersed the people to the ale barrels; and there were the "kail-pot" preachers, whose thrilling appeals "kept their audiences in rapt attention till night, all forgetful of the Sabbath kail simmering in the pot at home." Such a preacher was Mr. Willison, minister of the Gospel at Dundee, who would have his hearers incessantly divert their minds with holy things—expelling human nature by door, window, and cranny.

Are you weary of hearing? then recreate yourself with prayer. If of that, recreate yourself with singing God's praises. If of that, recreate yourself with meditating. If you weary of that, recreate yourself with Christian conference, repeating sermons, instructing your families. . . . If you weary of public duties, then go to private; if of these, go to secret duties.

Waxing even more definite and more holily drastic, Mr. Willison would continue in a strain which Mr. Graham summarises as follows:

"How think you to spend a whole eternity in spiritual exercises when you weary so much of one day?" But further than all this, there is not an action during that day—not a moment, from the instant the Christian awakes in the morning, or the birds begin to chirp—when his soul may not find occasion for fruitful meditation. As you put on your clothes, think of the soul's nakedness and need of the robes of imputed righteousness, and reflect that it is God's wool and flax you wear. As you comb your head think of your sins, which are more than the hairs thereon. When you sit at supper, think of the joy of supping with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. In short, there is not a minute when the believer may not meditate, pray, and break into holy ejaculations till the day ends. Then, as you see yourself stripped of clothing, think "Naked came I into the world, and naked shall I return," and let your lying down in bed and covering yourself with blankets put you in mind of your lying in the cold grave and being covered with earth.

Alike in their private prayers and their portentous sermons, the Presbyterian clergy strove after grace, atonement, "sweet peace," and triumphant moods of the soul. Righteousness of life, and the sacredness of daily duties, were hardly touched upon by these wrestlers before the Throne. Righteousness was filthy rags, and to say that a man could be saved by any amount of good works was "horrid blasphemy and the result of damnable ignorance." Morality, said one preacher, is "a desirable thing in its proper place, but soul-ruining when allowed to possess the place of Christ's imputed righteousness." One Presbytery went so far as to refuse, in 1717, to license a student until he stated: "I believe that it is not orthodox to say that we must forsake our sins in order to come to Christ." This was considered a little too startling, but it was only what the people loved to believe. They sinned and wept their way to the Throne with equal gusto. That amazing person, Lord Grange, and his friends "passed their time in alternate scenes of exercises of religion and debauchery, spending their days in prayer and pious meditation and their nights in lewdness and revelling"; and Dr. Carlyle, who tells us this, vouches for their sincerity in both moods: "There is no doubt of their profligacy, and I have frequently seen them drowned in tears during the whole of a sacramental day, when, so far as my observation could reach, they could have no rational object in acting a part." But if the preachers failed to exhort their flocks to practical righteousness, they did not fail to punish sinners. To whistle, or walk on the roads, or pull up a turnip on a Fast Day was to incur the pillory. "Siezers" and "compurgators" roamed the streets, spying into houses and even into rooms, and terrorising the people into silence and a show of prayer. No substantial meal was allowed on Sundays until the evening. As for grave offences, the punishments were so severe that they encouraged worse crimes than those they were devised to correct. Child-murder became common in an age when the unlawful parents had to stand for fifteen Sundays in sackcloth at the church door, bare-legged, in a tub of water, or to take their stand on the pillory. These exhibitions became something very like a sport.

It was a source of immense interest and pleasure for the congregation to watch the appearance and behaviour of their neighbours in disgrace. Smiles, smirks, and whispers passed from one to another, as well-known faces appeared in the place of ignominy. Young Jacobite lairds came to the kirk to enjoy the entertainment, which rendered the service less dreary and the Sabbath a delight.

It was in religion as it was in manners. The middle of the century saw the break-up of unnatural austerities, which were never effectual because they were never humane. No longer did ministers spend hours in detailing the torments of hell. No longer was righteousness accounted too filthy a rag to be mentioned in the pulpit. Dogmas were allowed to sleep and emotion was given a rest. The Rev. John Horne wrote a tragedy, and Dr. Jardine enjoyed the friendship of David Hume, and Dr. Webster "could join over a magnum of claret on Monday with gentlemen of not too correct lives whom he had consigned to perdition on Sunday." In a word, Scotland was coming into line with England. Mr. Graham's monumental work is the story of the initial stages of that process. Even now Scotland is Scotland, and is but dimly understood by thousands of thinking Englishmen. The charm of this book is that it portrays Scotland as it was, and explains Scotland as it is.

English Satirists.

English Satires. Edited by Oliphant Smeaton. (Blackie & Son. 3s. 6d.)

THIS volume of the "Warwick Library" is, let it be said frankly, a good idea indifferently executed. It was a good idea to compile a specimen-volume illustrating the main progress of English satire. But the editor has by no means shown the judgment which could be wished. His introduction, indeed, will serve; though in many respects it has a curiously old-fashioned air. We have, for instance, the ancient heresy revived that Pope "improved and polished" the versification of Dryden. Most modern critics have agreed with Leigh Hunt that Pope simply narrowed and mechanised it; and that his metre was (as has been said) "like a rocking-horse—long end up, short end down." What is more, the great modern poets (who ought to know) with Keats at their head, have gone to Dryden as their teacher in rhyming heroics, not to Pope. Mr. Smeaton relies on Prof. Courthope for the statement. The reader can choose between the poets and the Professor. We might produce more examples of what we mean; but Mr. Smeaton becomes exasperating when we follow him into detail. Nor does our quarrel lie with the preface, nor yet with the choice of authors, but with the choice of selections. Marvel is poorly represented by Nostradamus' Prophecy, when the far wittier satire on the Dutch, or that on Flecknoe, lay to hand. Dryden again, apart from MacFlecknoe, is represented by quite minor work. Pope is adequate; but from Swift only extract is given which shows him at the height of his powers—the dedication of the Tale of a Tub. Addison appears in but one piece, and so does Moore, whose brilliant light satire might surely have been represented. Canning's Epistle from Lord Boringdon to Earl Granville and Reformation of the Knave of Hearts (but inferior work) might have given place to more specimens from the Anti-Jacobin; and of Byron only the excerpt from the Vision of Judgment can be considered a satisfactory example. Praed at Praed's best is really not represented; Calverley has but a single piece. And (though this is a lesser matter) should Browning's Cristina and Lost Leader come under the head of satire proper?

Satire (though Mr. Smeaton seems to think otherwise) in these latter times has fallen on evil days. That it has lost its personal virulence is true; but in doing so it has lost its very character as satire. We do not say the consequence was necessary; but so it is. It is impossible to rank with the literary satire of old the swarms of ephemeral "skits" which fill the daily and periodical press. The increased stringency and severe interpretation of the libel laws has killed personal satire. These laws are administered by men for the most part ignorant of, and indifferent to, the question of literary justification—men who would cast Byron in heavy damages, and comment severely on the scurrility of Pope. And this has tended to encourage a general thinness of skin in society. The old tradition of literary give-and-take is no more. We have lost our robustness. The change is ill for satire, and not good for society. In old days the man who was satirised hit back—publicly or privately. Though the assailant were a Pope, and he the veriest among the aborigines of Grub-street—a Dennis or less than Dennis (who was really a sturdy specimen of what stood for journalism in the eighteenth century)—it mattered not: he drew his quill and wrote back at his redoubtable adversary. And we know that in his own day he often held his ground much more stoutly than appears to posterity. Nowadays Dennis would yelp like a dog under a cart-wheel; call heaven, earth, and the Law Courts to witness his scandalous indignities; vow he would have damages if there was a Libel Act in England, and get them—from a judge who would talk scathingly about the necessity of protecting honest citizens against such unjustifiable allusions as those of this Mr. Pope, who seemed to be a writer of some reputation, and, therefore, all the more necessary to be taught that the good name of private citizens was sacred in the eyes of the law. When you can hardly use the name of Smith in a novel, lest some owner of that exclusive patronymic should object to its employment, things are getting crowded for the luckless satirist. The success of one angry man with a grievance encourages others. When you can make the satirist pay in pocket, only the man of sense will submit to satire without advertising it in an action. And satire does not thrive on men of sense; while all the absurdities are under the protection of the law. It is not good for private manliness that public opinion should encourage this excitable and weak sensibility.

What a forest of flourishing trees would be thinned out from English literature had the Parliamentary Vulcan earlier furnished the Law with its awful libel thunderbolts! Chaucer and Langland might stand; so might Hall (no very biting satirist), and Donne (pungent, clever, with metre like a rope all hanks and knots); but from Butler downwards they are all inveterate libellists. Who has done justice to old Sam Butler, most singular and unpatterned of satirists? Not Charles II., who neglected him, so that no wonder the saturnine wit needed to be wound up by wine and lost its brilliance again after a bottle or two. Not Mr. Smeaton, who contributes little to the criticism of Hudibras beyond the observation that it would have been better had it been shorter. Not M. Taine, whose Gallic mind sees only a coarse burlesque—bears and trulls, and boors and bone-thumpings. Not average English opinion, which sees only a curious and now highly unreadable specimen of obsolete satire, containing some stock-extracts, and, like "Hamlet," very full of quotations. Hudibras has paid the penalty for the poor and clumsy scheme which doubtless helped its immediate popularity. As a narrative, no words of M. Taine can be too bad for it. The burlesque incidents are dull and coarse and stupid; the Skimmington and the bear and Trulla and the stocks and the whackings, all are in the most clownish vein of Anglo-Saxon humour. Butler is the dreariest Jack-Pudding that ever grinned at a fair; but when he forgets his framework, halts in the action, candidly confesses—"Story, God bless you! I have none to tell, sir!" and pours forth his personal reflections on men, affairs, and life; then what a difference! Then you have not merely satire, but the quintessence of a quite peculiar wit. Flash follows flash—brief, pregnant, admirably turned; illustrated by imagery the most comically apposite in its sudden juxtaposition of unexpected ideas, pointed by allusions drawn from the widest range of curious reading; and it is always Butler who reflects, whether the passage be put in the mouth of Hudibras, Whackum, Sidrophel, the Widow, or whom you please. Written frankly in the form of satiric monologues, these witty masterpieces would have been better and more enduring. Not all can relish them: they are apt to be too subtle for the average palate; though he mocks at metaphysics, there was much of Donne's metaphysical turn in Butler; his wit, too, almost demands a poet to relish it—it turns so much on analogy which, though comic, is really fanciful. You find the same thing in Congreve. When he describes two angry and breathless fools, "spluttering at one another like two roasting apples," the exquisitely ludicrous image is as much a stroke of fancy as if it had been serious. Once Congreve turns this power to serious use, and the result is charming. "You are a woman," his hero says, "one to whom heaven gave beauty when it grafted roses on a briar. You are the reflection of heaven in a pond, and he that leaps at you is sunk." A most graceful image! So Butler also trips into poetry when he writes of the moon's

Mysterious veil, of brightness made,
That's both her lustre and her shade.

Yet by the same exertion of fancy he can produce the satiric epigram,

Like the world, men's jobbernoles
Turn round upon their ears, the poles.

Or he can say:

Some have been cudgelled, till they know
What wood a cudgel's of by th' blow;
Some kicked, until they can tell whether
A shoe be Spanish or neat's leather.

For the lover of phantastic and subtly ingenious wit, Hudibras is still a treasury; to be dipped into like an anthology, not to be read through or continuously.

Only less read, if more talked about, is Dryden, Scott's (or Claud Halcro's) "Glorious John," who passed his life in cudgelling others, and was once literally cudgelled himself. Buckingham, who could, and did, revenge himself by a clever satire, might have spared that meaner vengeance. Yet, for the few who still love unfashionable letters, what a writer! What a careless bravery of strength, what a dexterity of touch, like the swashing brush of a Rubens! He just pats a verse, and leaves on it the dent of his leonine paw. Material seems immaterial to this wonderful gift of technique. He could have made a decent poem of Bradshaw's Guide; and what a satire he would have made of Kruger, on whom modern writers are puffing in the effort to be "smart"! Pope we know: his epigram is more akin to modern methods. But who reads Swift? It is the strangest irony of fate, more sardonic than Swift's own, that the grimmest satire of this gloomy and terrible master of irony should be chiefly known as a fairy tale for children! He had every gift of satire save mirth; he was an amazing master of English: but modern man finds life too sad that he should add to it the reading of Swift. You must take him with antidotes, as his own age did: the delightful archness of Addison's finished raillery, the sweet-tempered laughter of Steele.

Must not one take Byron also with some antidote? A magnificent satirist, who wasted an unfortunate amount of time in writing poetry, with him the great line ends. Nowise inferior, at his strongest, to the powerful satirists of the eighteenth century, he added a peculiarly personal quality of reckless dash and mordant mockery. "The Vision of Judgment" is well-nigh Satanic in the scathing and blasting force of its derision. There is something in it, perhaps, caught from Voltaire. It is this heartless quality which asks an antidote. He was the first to take a delight in persistently satirising the school-girl, the "bread-and-butter miss." Only Byron would have broken this butterfly on so cruel a wheel. You may find his antidote in Moore, whose serious verse has suffered more eclipse than Byron's own. But his light satiric pieces are brilliantly deft in workmanship, with the adroitness natural air of artifice; gay and stinging as dragon-flies. Why should not satire find a possibility of resurrection in the method of these? Formal satire, in all its plenitude of rhetorical art, is grown impossible. We will scarce give attention to an ode, much less to a lengthy piece of didactic ridicule. Nor will modern conditions permit Moore's personality. But surely the field of social and political satire is still open? And such glittering arrow-flights of polished, easy, daintily-edged and finished banter as his were the very thing to take modern taste. Any way, for a first-rate light satirist the age waits—with more cutting-power, more weight behind the fine edge, than is in Præd, or his many successors.

A Mushroom Metropolis.

Alaska and the Klondike. By Angelo Heilprin. (Pearsons. 7s. 6d.)

THE literature of the Klondike grows steadily. A Bret Harte the brumal goldfields still await; but novelists and poets have already dwelt in their midst, among them Mr. Hamlin Garland and Mr. Joaquin Miller (who was frost-bitten in the service of the Tenth Muse), and geographers, experts, and descriptive journalists have spent much ink on accounts of their experiences. No better book, however, has yet been written on the subject than Mr. Angelo Heilprin's. He has come to his task with a fuller idea of what the distant stay-at-home reader wants; a more curious and catholic pair of eyes; and, what is quite as much to the point, a more intelligent or more fortunate camera. Hence this book gives us a more comprehensive idea of the Klondike, socially and physically, than we have obtained from any other source. Mr. Heilprin, who is an American geographer and geologist of considerable reputation, visited Alaska and the Klondike in the summer of 1898, from July to October; so that his information is but a year old. Since the completion of his MS., it is true, the greater part of the business portion of Dawson City has been destroyed by fire; but his picture of that mushroom metropolis holds good none the less. Fire only makes smoke and ashes, it does not alter a town's character. Mr. Heilprin's Dawson chapters are so informing and interesting that we are tempted to confine our account of his book to that section of it, remarking merely that he offers also valuable hints to intending miners, including the laws governing placer mining in the Yukon district, and that his photographs are of exceptional beauty and are exceptionally well reproduced.

On Mr. Heilprin's arrival at Dawson in August, 1898, he found most of the sixteen thousand inhabitants in the streets. "This is not strange, for it must have been difficult to resist that soft, warm atmosphere. . . . Never had I experienced anything comparable." Picking his way from plank to plank, laid along the sidewalk to keep one free of the pervading and appalling mud, Mr. Heilprin sought the Fair View Hotel, the best in the place, offering "all the modern improvements." There he was shown to a room "elegantly furnished" with a bed, a washstand table of rough wood, a metal basin, and, where the window-panes ought to be, a stretch of canvas. Glass, it seems, was forgotten by Dawson builders, and may not yet have been remembered. The room had no chair and no hooks or nails. On inquiring the price, Mr. Heilprin was informed that it was thirty-five dollars a week or six dollars and a half a night. Board was twenty-five dollars a week, rising to thirty-five before the traveller left, not because his appetite was excessive, but because the standard rose everywhere. In August, for example, cow's milk was sixty dollars the gallon.

The leaves of my note-book [says Mr. Heilprin] furnish some interesting data relative to the condition of a part of the Dawson "market" during the time of my visit: Oranges and lemons, 75 cents apiece (later in the season, two or three for 50 cents); apples, 25 cents, or, in some places, two for a quarter; potatoes and onions, 75 cents the pound; butter, $1 the pound; eggs, presumably fresh, but ordinarily with a stale inheritance, $2.50 a dozen; radishes, 75 cents a bunch of five pieces; cabbages, $1 the pound; bread, as has before been stated, four to six loaves for a dollar; ordinary beer, a dollar a bottle; Bass's ale, $2.50 a pint; sugar, 30 cents a pound; canned tomatoes and meats, 75 cents a can; flour, $10 a sack of fifty pounds. . . . Among what might with a certain flavour be properly classed as luxuries were a few water-melons, which were disposed of for $25 apiece—the last one at a dollar the slice—and a number of cucumbers, which the vendor, with a regretful remembrance of the low sale, told me he had sold for $5 apiece. He felt certain that he could just as well have levied to the extent of $6 or $7. Pine-apples brought but little more than cucumbers, and cocoanuts tumbled to $1 the nut. Chickens, which earlier in the season had sold for $100 for three, were obtainable at $10 apiece.

These are high rates. Clothes, however, are not so excessively dear—with the exception of millinery. A Dawson milliner told Mr. Heilprin that she had sold a hat trimmed with two ostrich feathers for two hundred and eighty dollars.

A better view of the abnormal standard of value is perhaps to be gained from the price of the newspapers. Dawson has three, all weekly—the Nugget, the Midnight Sun, and the Dawson Miner. The first two are fifty cents, or two shillings, each, the other a shilling. American papers and magazines, no matter how belated, always command a ready sale; while the scenic books of the transcontinental railways, which are gratuitously circulated in ordinary places, find ready buyers at fifty cents. Mr. Heilprin facsimiles a portion of the Yukon Midnight Sun, among the "Personals" being this pretty paragraph:

D. H. Hansen, assistant postmaster, has put in a busy week. A batch of mails, consisting of 65 bags of papers and 35 sacks of letters, came in Wednesday, and with the facilities at hand Mr. Hansen is all but swamped. Among the matter received was a package of bread, butter, and Limburger cheese addressed to "Hungry Joe." The clerks have buried it in a cellar, and it will be dug up whenever "Hungry Joe" asks for his mail.

Dawson City has its humours no less than Red Gulch and Sandy Bar. Its Bret Harte, when he comes, will find much matter ready to his hand.

But the reading matter most sedulously desired comes, of course, through the post; and yet so constant is the migration from city to the fields that hundreds of letters are not claimed for months and months. Says Mr. Heilprin:

One of the most interesting sights was to see the large number of letters awaiting ownership, which were tacked up to the fronts and sides of different buildings, in the most public way petitioning for rapid delivery. My first letter in Dawson was obtained by stripping it from a door-jamb, but it was three weeks before my attention had been directed to it by a friendly discoverer. To obtain anything from the post-office was a most exhaustive process, and usually required a long wait, sometimes of a day, or even of two days, before entry could be obtained into the small room where the sorting, distribution, and dispensation of mail matter were being effected. Even when finally issued, this matter was usually of several weeks' antiquity of arrival, the sorting of tons of substance being much beyond the capacity of the few official hands that were engaged in the work.

Yet there are favoured persons who do not need to wait:

Woman is a privileged character in Dawson. She has immediate entrée into the depositories of mails, of records, and of claims. Others may sit or stand waiting their turn for days or more in a row; she walks in by the side door with an air of superiority which is as impressive as it is refreshing. She files her claim in the Recorder's office with dignity, while her trousered rival, who may have staked five days earlier, is still studying the entrance from the outside. She reads her mail with smiles and satisfaction, while others are informed that the sorting will not be a fait accompli for still a week or more, or that they have already inquired once during the same fortnight.

Mr. Heilprin here refers to the wives and mothers in the community. To his remarks on the bona roba, an influential person, we must refer the reader to the book.

As to amusements: Dawson has four theatres or opera houses, and many drinking, gambling and dancing saloons. The taste of the playgoers is for highly spiced entertainment, but during Mr. Heilprin's stay a Sunday sacred concert was successfully carried through in one of the worst dancing halls. It has been stated that the Klondike miner, when pleased with a performer, pelts him with nuggets. Mr. Heilprin saw it done only once, and the fortunate person on that occasion was an infant phenomenon much more in need, thinks the author, of a good smacking. Masked balls are held weekly when the dark evenings begin. Gambling goes on all day with no attempt at concealment. The bars are crowded, but Mr. Heilprin saw little drunkenness. Swindlers are, he says, surprisingly few. Everyone seems to enjoy a feeling of security. Concerning Dawson society he has some interesting passages, one only of which we have room to quote:

Much of the better element that might be thought to make up society is found, not in Dawson itself, but in the outskirts which constitute the gold regions. Many a pleasant hour can there be spent discoursing from the summits of "dumps," from the cutting edges of flumes and sluice-boxes, or by the babbling brookside, with its banks of leaves and flowers. And the conversation need not turn, either, on gold, and on "right" and "left limits," upon "bench claims" or "creek claims," upon "bed-rock" or "rim-rock," or upon the woes of the Edmonton and Stickeen routes; but if you have been astute enough to discover in your neighbour or "pardner" the gamut of his or her knowledge, it will not be amiss at times to direct the conversation in the lines of New Zealand terraces, the aims and prospects of Polar exploration, of Austrian politics, or the virtues of Quo Vadis.

Here we must stop. Mr. Heilprin's pages, it will be seen, bring Dawson very near. His photographs fill one with a desire to visit this wonderful country.

Miss Lucas's Poems.

Fugitives. By Winifred Lucas. (Lane. 5s.)

THE defect in Miss Lucas's previous volume of poems, Units, was a rare defect in feminine verse—an overplus of intellect and too little emotional power. At the same time, the best pieces of that volume stamped her a poet of uncommon and distinctive quality. On opening the present book, Fugitives, we looked naturally to see whether there was increase in the defective quality. It hardly appeared likely, almost seemed to demand a change of nature; and yet it does appear to us that Miss Lucas has gained in emotional power, to the advantage of her poetry as a whole. At least, there are a larger proportion of pieces which have the "lift" of feeling. If emotion without intellect makes poetry of a low order, intellect without emotion will not make poetry at all, therefore we trust that this gain may stay and increase with Miss Lucas, for even in this book the intellect would often bear more suppling.

It is a very striking little volume, full of interior beauty. The poems are brief—often not above a quatrain—but each has a thought behind it, and the thought is rarely other than original. For the most part, it is extremely subtle, and not always does the author escape the difficulties of condensed expression to which it gives rise. But the reader who is not afraid to grapple with thought will find here a rich reward. The feeling, too, wherever it manifests itself, is of a rare delicacy and fragrance. Few will deny the loveliness of "The Balance":

Must I endure with nothing to forgive,
Who did a shade wrong thee?
Oh, love! an instant less than perfect live,
A little injure me.

Wound me at last. For once a word of mine
Thy service did forsake.
Deal harshly now, lest all of me that's thine
Be but the amends I make.

"Love Heroic" shows the subtlety of Miss Lucas's thought. Here it is:

Companioned on the path you chose,
You go the way
A hero goes.
His words you say,
Your deeds he does.
Though in your love to heaven he rose,
The way he knows
Immortal in your life to stay.

Or take, finally, the beautiful blending of keen intellect and tender feeling which Miss Lucas calls "Approach":

Into my heart you come a thousand ways;
In multitude you come;
New selves born freely of the changing days—
Old selves that seek me confident of home.
My arms are opening for—I know not whom.
Oh, life beloved! that many a mood must share,
Is one too new,
Or wise to trust me as the old ones do?
They come! they come!—the strange, familiar, dear;
Unquestioning all—innumerable you.

From these examples the reader may gather some idea of Miss Lucas. A poet of one aspect, grave, intellectual (the word will be repeated in any description of Miss Lucas), with the rare sweetness of grave natures slanting across her poetry, she has a remarkable power of making concrete all but abstract conceptions, which sets her by herself. Perhaps she has derivations from Mrs. Meynell—one catches a reminiscent phrase or cadence here and there—but of no other poet does she remind us. As regards expression, a want of careful attention to grammatical precision, leaving her meaning open to doubt, and an occasional involution of structure (the result of effort at compression) are the chief faults we complain of in this respect. Fugitives is a treasurable little volume, and the work of a writer of very unique gift.

Morocco.

The Moorish Empire. By Budgett Meakin. (Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 15s.)

MOROCCO, in spite of a good many literary exploring expeditions, is still a land full of secret places and hidden treasures. Its very atmosphere of mystery is, in fact, its chief attraction, even as was noted by Lancelot Addison, father of the famous essayist, in his account of Western Barbary, written towards the end of the eighteenth century. Of late years there has been an increase in the number of the pioneers in this half-worked field, and of them Mr. Meakin may fairly claim to be as well equipped as any. He has spent many years among the Moors, as his father did before him. He has expounded their language. He has described their land. He has portrayed their life. And now, to round off his record, he has compiled their history. Here is a sample of Mr. Meakin's historical style from his chapter on "The Salli Rovers," those friends of our Robinson Crusoe days:

Beyond a doubt the Moors originally owed nearly all they knew of sea warfare to Europeans, from whom at a later period they almost exclusively obtained not only their arms but also their vessels. Indeed, foreigners were often caused to serve as officers on board the pirate vessels against their will, as in the case of John Dunton, who, when master and pilot of a Salli man-of-war, ran her to the Isle of Wight. He was appointed to the Leopard, one of the English fleet sent to bombard Salli. It has even been asserted by a most competent contemporaneous authority—Captain John Smith, the president and planter of Virginia, who was as intimate as anyone with that class of sailors—that the Moorish pirates were taught their trade by the pirates of our own land.

There is much of interest about these sea-robbers, and many a harrowing tale is told of the sufferings and torture of European captives. In fact, the Moorish chronicles are freely sprinkled with gore from beginning to end.

But to the general reader the more interesting chapters are to be found in the second half of the book, where foreign diplomatic relations, Moorish diplomatic usages, foreign rights and privileges, commercial intercourse and foreign protection, and the future of the empire are discussed. There is encouragement for intending visitors in the following:

At present, although there is always the usual procrastination and shuffling, assaults on Europeans, by whomsoever committed, are invariably atoned for, the neighbourhood of the occurrence usually being heavily fined as well. Consequently the lives and property of Europeans are as safe in Morocco, wherever the authority of the Sultan is complete, as in any other semi-civilised land, although to have a valid claim for damages, foreign travellers are supposed to be accompanied by two native policemen or makhúzins as guards. Every village at which a halt is made provides a guard for the night in its own interests, and throughout the lowlands journeys are undertaken without fear. Something of this state of things is doubtless due to the moral quality recognised by 'Abd er-Rahmán II., who wrote that the Christians at least kept their word, but that the Moors had neither word nor faith. And it is the proudest boast of English sojourners in Morocco that they have become known as "the people of one word."

For those curious in such matters there is a series of short reviews of previous works on Morocco. Her place in fiction is also considered, and Mr. Hall Caine's Scapegoat is described as the only published Moroccan novel worth reading, though it presents far too sombre a picture. There is a sketch of the newspaper press of the country, in which special mention is made of the Times of Morocco. It was on the latter journal founded in 1884 that Mr. Meakin served the apprenticeship which has expanded into authorship, as to the value of which he has no need to be unduly diffident. As a chronicler of a little known land he proves himself clear in style, critical in the selection of his authorities, and withal distinctly readable.

LONDON SOUVENIRS.

BY C. W. HECKETHORN.

Mr. Heckethorn's book wants the two qualities which would make it acceptable: an attractive personal tone and a graceful style. As to its tone: Mr. Heckethorn is always expressing violent opinions about matters which do not fall within his proper view. Thus in writing of the Tabard Inn he encloses a large issue within a sentence of mere statement:

An inn which has been rendered famous by Chaucer's rhymed tales—we cannot honestly call them poetry—of the Canterbury Pilgrims is the Tabard, in the Borough.

We do not discuss Mr. Heckethorn's judgment in this matter, we merely point out that it is intrusive and disconcerting. In "Curious Stories of the Stock Exchange," Mr. Heckethorn is not content to tell his curious stories; he must describe the Stock Exchange as "a desolation—spreading upas-tree planted in the mephitic morass of the national debt." In another essay we have a sneer at the "jerky platitudes of a Tennyson, and the jejune prose, cut up into measured lines, of a Browning." Now, Tennyson's poetry is as little jerky as Browning's "prose" is jejune; such by-way criticism is an impertinence. But Mr. Heckethorn does not hesitate to trample on our most cherished feelings. Thus, in an essay on "The Sublime Beefsteakers," he interpolates a diatribe on chops and steaks as a "relic of barbarism."

Steaks done on a gridiron are antediluvian enough, but mutton chops diffusing, when undergoing this process, throughout the room the stench of a tallow candle just blown out, are enough to turn the stomach, not of the refined gourmet only, but of the untutored savage.

If Mr. Heckethorn fails as a critic, he simply does not exist as a stylist. His sentences are the most awkward in the world. In an essay on Hampton Court Palace, he describes Cardinal Wolsey as a most unmitigated villain, on a par with that other villain, Henry VIII., whose master, through being his pimp, he was for a time, till, in perfect accordance with his character, he became his abject slave.

Again:

As the bar of the inn frequently was in the yard, the noises made by its visitors, and the quarrels they occasionally indulged in, and which often would be settled by a fight in the yard, were not calculated to promote sound sleep.

Top-heavy sentences like the following abound:

Indulging in all the superstitious tendencies of gamblers, he [Beau Brummel] at one time attributed his luck to the finding of a crooked sixpence in the kennel, as he was walking with Mr. Raikes, who tells the story, through Berkeley-square.

London is not too well served by authors. Ungainly information and stale vivacity have had their innings. We demand something new and better. (Chatto & Windus.)

A PICTURESQUE HISTORY OF

YORKSHIRE. PART VII.

BY J. S. FLETCHER.

Mr. Fletcher's history now enters on its second volume. The principal neighbourhoods treated in this part are those of Wakefield, Huddersfield, and Halifax. Mr. Fletcher gives us an interesting account of the Halifax Gibbet Law, under which any theft of goods to the value of thirteenpence-halfpenny committed within the liberty of the forest of Hardwick was summarily punished by death—death, moreover, by decapitation. This drastic law was made in the interests of the local cloth merchants, and the executions were of a very formal character. The "gibbet," apparently, was neither more nor less than a guillotine. The beggars' saying, "From Hell, Hull, and Halifax deliver us," is probably connected with these executions. Mr. Fletcher quotes an interesting account of Halifax from Defoe's Tour Through England. But the year of Defoe's visit is incorrectly stated as 1727. Defoe's three months' residence in Halifax occurred in 1712. In July of that year he had completed his Review with a rather bitter farewell to his readers: "I sometime ago summed up the scenes of my life in this distich:

No man has tasted differing fortunes more,
And thirteen times I have been rich and poor."

Temporarily disgusted with political life, and harassed, it may be, by his creditors, who always turned up in his evil hours, Defoe may have gone to Halifax for quiet and to escape some inappeasable bailiff. He was soon absorbed in the study of local trade and customs. As a bankrupt merchant he could exult in the prosperity of the cloth-makers, who were turning out 100,000 pieces of shalloon a year; and as the son of a butcher he could note with satisfaction the fine autumn trade in black cattle done in Halifax market. He tells us that at this season people bought a whole year's supply of beef for their families—buying the live bullocks, which they killed, cut up, and salted or smoked. The illustrations to this Part strike us as better—as being more informing—than some which Mr. Fletcher has admitted. (J. M. Dent & Co. 1s. net.)

TANGWEERA.

BY C. NAPIER BELL.

This book gives a very interesting account of peaceful life among the gentle savages of Central America. Though written in the author's old age, it is a record of his youth. As a boy Mr. Bell grew up among the Indians and negroes of the Mosquito Coast, and frankly enjoyed the wild life of rivers, lagoons, and primeval forests. The Mosquito Indians are the one race of Central America which is essentially maritime. They have few of the bush instincts, but they love ships and the sea. Mr. Bell describes them as bold, adventurous, and outspoken. Of course they are dying out. The diseases and ailments of civilised races, combined with a low birth-rate, are surely diminishing their numbers. Moreover, since 1856 the English protection, under which the five fine tribes of Mosquito Indians had thriven, was withdrawn, and although a "reserve" was established in the country, and the rights of the Indians otherwise protected, yet under the Spaniards of Honduras and Nicaragua the race has declined. Mr. Bell concludes his book with the mournful statement that the Mosquito Indians "are worried to death by proselytising monks and priests; and every pretext is sought to infringe upon their liberty, to bring them under taxation, and force them to live in industrial communities; and we know that such radical change of habits is fatal to all free people, just as it would be fatal to a stag to yoke it to a cart."

Mr. Bell's descriptions of the Indian life are graphic and interesting. We quote from his account of the return of the Indians from the turtle fisheries in May. By the end of that month (the fishing begins in January) "they begin to languish for their wives and children, and turn their canoes homeward":

The Indians are not acquainted with the art of kissing, but they sniff or smell the skin of the cheeks, which answers the same purpose. The little child is lifted in the father's arms, and he buries his nose in its stomach. Hand-shaking is as common as with us, but I have noticed that there is always a tinge of melancholy in the character of the Indians, which breaks out where we should expect hilarity. Thus, after a long absence, sisters and mothers sit down, and throwing a cloth over their heads, with their hands clasped on the head of the person who has returned, cry over him with their dirge-like song. On the part of the wives, it is supposed to be improper to show any emotion, consequently they take little notice of the husband on his return, but confine their attention to others and to their duties in the meantime.

One other touch, and we must leave this interesting book to its predestined readers who, we hope, will be many. The Mosquito Indian invokes his mother on every occasion when we should invoke God. "Their invocation of their mother is quite as comforting and consoling to them as it is to us to invoke God. I never saw anything so touching as a young Indian, who died from a wound in the stomach, crying with his last breath, 'Oh, mother, mother!' His mother had been dead several years." (Arnold. 16s.)

Our Coloured Supplement.

We publish this week, by arrangement with Mr. John C. Nimmo and Mr. Carl Hentschel, two pictures in colour which show the application of an improved process of colour printing to book illustration. Three colours only are used, and the process, elaborated during many years by Mr. Hentschel, is necessarily a secret one in its details.

The name "Colortype" is applied to this newly-adapted process. The engraver's general procedure is this: The object to be illustrated is engraved in sections by mechanical process on metal plates, each representing a stage in the finished scheme of colour. By limiting the plates to the three essential colours, and producing variations and shades by printing one over the other, as many effects are obtained in three printings, at letterpress speed, as can be got in eight or ten slow workings on stone; and by duplicating the blocks for long runs, the speed may be indefinitely increased. It may be confidently predicted that coloured illustrations have a more or less immediate "future" before them.

The pictures we reproduce are two of many illustrations in Miss Margaret Thomas's new book, Two Years in Palestine and Syria. Miss Thomas's book on Spain and Tangier is prized by many readers for its vivid descriptions. In her new work she brings the same pictorial gift to bear on the Holy Land, again telling us particularly those things which we are interested in knowing, and illustrating her pages with her own clever brush. The chapter on religious ceremonies in Jerusalem contains a circumstantial account of the Greek Miracle of the Holy Fire at Easter in the Church of the Sepulchre, the wonderful scene which formed the subject of Mr. Holman Hunt's last picture. Here is a passage:

At last a number of priests carrying banners issued from the Greek Church amid the applause of the multitude, and with a rush some men, headed by a priest, took possession of a space opposite the hole [whence the fire was to come], which had hitherto been kept vacant. These were pilgrims from Damascus, who had given the largest sum of money to be the first to light their candles at the Holy Fire. At this point sticks and whips were freely used. Then a procession of priests joined those carrying the banners, and the Greek patriarch himself, in lavishly decorated robes and crown, and looking like a mass of silver and gold, appeared; all walked round the Sepulchre three times, headed by three gorgeous Kowasses, and soldiers carrying whips. The crowd shouted and sang, and a free fight occurred in front of the hole, in which many persons were injured. The priests became very nervous, and hurried on the procession. When the Patriarch arrived opposite the door of the Sepulchre for the last time, they hastily unrobed him of his gorgeous vestments, and ran off with them, while he himself rushed quickly into the Sepulchre. In a minute or so the bells burst forth with a triumphant clang, the priest nearest the hole thrust a candle into it, drew it forth alight, and ran off with it; the crowd rushed towards it amid inexpressible confusion; those whose candles were burning first handed the light to their friends, and passed it on from one to another; strings were let down from the balconies with candles to be lighted, priests set fire to the whole of the lamps and candles about the Sepulchre, and in an incredibly short space of time the huge place was filled with blaze and smoke.

Miss Thomas calls the spectacle a disgrace to the Church which allows it. Her book is to be cordially recommended, both for its interest and its illustrations. (Nimmo. 12s. 6d.)

Fiction.

Gilian the Dreamer: his Fancy, his Love, his Adventure. By Neil Munro. (Isbister & Co. 6s.)

WHILE recognising with pleasure that Mr. Munro has lavished upon this book the loving care of an artist, and that he has a due and rare enough sense of the dignity of fiction, we shall permit ourselves to say, with neither hesitation nor reservation, that Gilian the Dreamer has disappointed us. It is tedious. No worse charge than this can be brought against any honestly wrought book; nevertheless we bring it—in sorrow. The story is of the Highlands, and is largely made up of minute descriptions of Highland scenery and manners and peculiarities. These matters, to a Highlander—and especially to a Highlander exiled—may have their charm, set down as they are by Mr. Munro with the very opulence of detail. But to the "Sassenach" (Mr. Munro's own word—often employed) they lack interest. We do not assert that they cannot be interesting; we think they might be; we say merely that Mr. Munro has not made them interesting:

"I daresay, sir, I daresay," said Mr. Spencer gravely. "You are a most interesting and sensitive people, and I find myself often making the most unhappy blunders."

"Interesting is not the word, I think, Mr. Spencer," said General Turner coldly; "we refuse to be interesting to any simple Sassenach." Then he saw the confusion in the innkeeper's face and laughed.

The Highlanders are a haughty and exclusive people, excessively and proudly provincial, and throughout the novel the Sassenach has a feeling that he is only allowed to peep on sufferance and as a great favour. Else why should the pages be peppered with words which Mr. Munro well knows not one reader in a hundred will understand—even with veritable Gaelic?

But no implied disdain of the general public would prevent the general public from enjoying Gilian the Dreamer if it contained the elements of enjoyment. It does not contain those elements. It fails as a work of art. And it fails because, first, Mr. Munro's theme is exiguous and inadequate; second, he is consistently unfortunate in the invention of apposite incident; third, he observes too much and observes without distinction; fourth (and most fatal) there is no sufficient vitalising force of imagination at the back of the book. Hidden amid vast hills of description and secondary matter, the rivulet of a theme moves sluggishly and vaguely to nowhere in particular. What is the idée-mère? We have read the tale carefully, but we do not know. Is Gilian an idiot, or is he only a mild, wistful, pathetic ass? He is one of the two, and it may be that Mr. Munro meant him to be the former, and to convey to us the strange pathos of his love for Nan and his love for nature. We are far from sure of this. That any single definite tangible thing except death happens in the whole story we deny. We also deny that any character except the Paymaster's sister has genuine fascination or genuine strength; and that any description of natural beauties sticks in the memory.

The Patten Experiment. By Mary E. Mann. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

MRS. MANN is a serious worker in fiction, a conscientious and well-endowed artist making continuous progress book by book. The Patten Experiment is excellent, and shows that the rate of Mrs. Mann's improvement is increasing. It is not a novel to get enthusiastic about; rather, it quietly and thoroughly satisfies. Having read it, you will say: "Here is an author who has observation, humour, wide sympathy, a steady view, and some philosophy. I have enjoyed her book, and it has taught me something." And is not this distinguished praise? Mrs. Mann deals with the lot of the agricultural labourer. He exists, smokes, drinks, marries, and brings up five or six children on a total income of eleven shillings a week. Or he is said to do this thing. Can he do it? Does he do it? If so, how? Such questions were often asked by the charitable Mrs. Boyan, wife of a wealthy landowner and gentleman-farmer who accepted the current bourgeois opinion that eleven shillings a week, with management, was sufficient for the labourer in his station. The Boyans had daughters, big and little, one of whom was just married to a very earnest curate, Eustace Patten. Eustace decided to put himself in the position of the labourer for one week. He got together a party consisting of himself, his brother, his wife, her nearly adult sister Rosamond, and her two tiny sisters. They took a cottage (rent, a shilling), and with eleven shillings essayed to live for a week.

The Patten Experiment is the history of that attempt—a history full not only of delightful humour but of pathos. The affair was almost a tragedy, but it did succeed—in a way. Within the first forty-eight hours the household was brought almost to despair, and took into its confidence its kindly next-door neighbour.

So Mrs. Chaney sniffed at the cheese, weighed the pound of butter in her fingers, appraised the other contents of Rica's basket.

"Of course, miss," she said, "you've got your ma to fall back on." But Rica explained that this was by no means the case.

"Look here," Rosamond said, "if we die of starvation, we've got to live on eleven shillings a week, and you've got to tell us how to do it. Now, how much a meal do you reckon to allow each person?"

Mrs. Chaney shook her head. "If you're goin' to parcel it out so," she said, "you'll never do it. Try to plan the money and you'll go downright crazy a-findin' out it can't be done. There ain't no rules, and there can't be. Sometimes you go without this, and sometimes without that. Sometimes you pinch tight here, and sometimes 'tis there. Times you get into debt when you can't help yourself, till the day comes round when you don't want so much coal, nor yet no candles, and then you pay up—"

"Debt," said Rosamond, pausing in the process of wiping the Britannia-metal teaspoons, and with a sudden lighting of her face. "Ah!"

However—though they hungered, though they had headaches, though they quarrelled, though they were agonised by indigestion—they kept out of debt. The lesson of pity which they learnt was cheap at the trifling price paid. Moreover, Mrs. Patten's sister got engaged to Mr. Patten's brother. (The strange courting is admirably done.) Mrs. Mann is conspicuously successful in character-drawing, and in portraying the intimate comedy of domestic life. But in The Patten Experiment there is something of deeper import beneath the surface of events. It is a book which will make the most thoughtless think.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE CROWN OF LIFE.

BY GEORGE GISSING.

This time it is love, and this is probably the most optimistic book Mr. Gissing has written. Through crowds of characters, and pages of analysis and description, he leads his hero, an idealist, after much tribulation, to his heart's desire. In the love scenes, the rough as well as the smooth, Mr. Gissing is at his best. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE SHIP OF STARS.

BY A. T. QUILLER-COUCH.

Mr. Quiller-Couch's new story is a West Country romance, in which we follow the hero from his dreamful boyish days to the adventures of his manhood. The story is full of tender sentiment and fine action, and we refer elsewhere to the author's dedicatory letter. (Cassell & Co. 6s.)

RED POTTAGE.

BY MARY CHOLMONDELEY.

This is the story, by a novelist whose books come slowly, of two women and a man. The women are the closest friends, closer than women are usually able to be, and much closer than youths allow to be possible. One, Hester, is a novelist, the other, Rachel, an heiress. The man is worthless, and Rachel discovers it in time. That is the main story, but the incidentals are many and interesting, and worthy the author of Diana Tempest. A book to be read as carefully as it was written. (Arnold. 6s.)

MCTEAGUE.

BY FRANK NORRIS.

By the author of that powerful and interesting story Shanghaied. Mr. Norris has strength, and he has spared us nothing in McTeague, which is a naturalistic story of a low stratum of San Franciscan life. It is a grim yarn, but there is no denying its power. The chief character, McTeague, is a quack dentist, who dies horribly in the end. (Richards. 6s.)

NO SOUL ABOVE MONEY.

BY WALTER RAYMOND

This is a sombre West Country tragedy by the author of Two Men o' Mendip. The central incident is an attack on the miser of the book by his daughter's lover, made at her instigation. Money caused the crime. The last chapter forms a gloss on Tennyson's ballad "Rizpah." The rural background to Mr. Raymond's drama mitigates its grimness. (Longmans. 6s.)

HIS DARLING SIN.

BY M. E. BRADDON.

Miss Braddon's sixty-second novel introduces us at once to a young widow of twenty-one who is left with an income "described by her friends and the gossiping Press at anything you like between twenty and fifty thousand a year." As she has been brought up "to do without things," the reader's interest is at once awakened. Later we spy murder. (Simpkin, Marshall. 6s.)

THE COLOSSUS.

BY MORLEY ROBERTS.

In this book Mr. Roberts departs for a while from yarns of adventure to give us a study of Mr. Cecil Rhodes. At least, when a man is called the Colossus, and is said to be the strongest force in Africa, and is found meditating a railway from Cape Town to Cairo, we are fain to call him Cecil Rhodes even if his name in the book is Eustace Loder. Mr. Rhodes's independence of feminine influence is fairly well known, but Mr. Roberts leaves him at the end of this work perilously near marriage. (Arnold. 6s.)

MR. JACK HAMLIN'S MEDIATION, AND OTHER STORIES.

BY BRET HARTE.

Eight Californian stories in the author's characteristic vein. "When the Waters were Up at Jules," "An Esmeralda of Rocky Cañon," and "The Boom in the 'Calaveras Clarion'" are, perhaps, the three most attractive of the sub-titles. (Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

A SPLICED YARN.

BY GEORGE CUPPLES.

Those who have read that capital sea story, The Green Hand, will welcome this aftermath from the pen of George Cupples. The present story is full of delightful touches of description, and deeper appeals to the sailor that is in every Englishman. (Gibbings & Co. 5s.)

ONE HOUR AND THE NEXT.

BY MILLICENT SUTHERLAND.

This is the first appearance of the Duchess of Sutherland as a novelist. A principal character wishes to see "the gospel of discontent preached from the house-tops to the slaves of England," and the story is largely concerned with Socialism and the Labour troubles. (Methuen. 6s.)

A BITTER VENGEANCE.

By K. DOUGLAS KING.

A tragic novel by the author of Father Hilarion and The Scripture-Reader of St. Mark's. The principal characters are members of a troop of strolling players. A touching and picturesque story. (Pearson Ltd. 6s.)

YOUNG APRIL.

By EGERTON CASTLE.

A romance, reprinted from Temple Bar, by the author of The Pride of Jennico. Mr. Castle has an urbane, genial way with him. His new hero is the Young Duke of Rochester—a nineteenth century peer—and the matter of the book is his adventures with the fair. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE HAUNTS OF MEN.

By R. W. CHAMBERS.

A collection of short stories by one of the most brilliant of the younger American novelists. Mr. Chambers, who is perhaps best known by his King in Yellow, finds his tales in battle and in peace, in America and in the Quartier Latin. (Bowden. 6s.)

THE RED RAT'S DAUGHTER.

By GUY BOOTHBY.

"Why, my dear fellow, it's all as plain as daylight now that we've got the key to the puzzle." This is on page 378, and the Red Rat is a convict "who once defied the united police of Europe," and was sent to Saghalien. (Ward, Lock & Co. 5s.)

THE LORD OF THE HARVEST.

By M. BETHAM-EDWARDS.

The title of this novel is founded on an old custom, much honoured by Suffolk harvestmen, of electing one of their number to be Lord of the Harvest. The lord in this case is Elisha Sage, a typical farm labourer, who had carried off kettle after kettle at the yearly ploughing match. A story of tender and serious interest, with a delightful rural background. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE FOLLY OF ALISON.

By FLORENCE MARRYAT.

A Society story. "My creed, Alison, has always been this: that, since we are none of us perfection, we have no right to expect perfection in others; and that, for every fault man and wife commit, the best plea we can have here (as it will be the only plea hereafter) is that we are sorry and repent of it." (F. V. White. 6s.)

VALDA HÂNEM.

By DAISY HUGH PRYCE.

The "Romance of a Turkish Harem" which has been running anonymously through Macmillan's Magazine. The scene is laid in Cairo, and the story is of the passion of Captain Fitzroy for the heroine and of its unhappy issue. The pictures of Oriental life are vivid and full of colour. (Macmillan. 6s.)

VRONI.

By BLANCHE WILLIS HOWARD.

A posthumous story by the author of One Summer and Guenn. Vroni was a charming girl from the village of Hexenfels, between the Danube and the Neckar, and the book is a pleasant romance, dashed with humour here and sadness there. "There's awful foolishness in God's brave world" says one of the characters. (Warne. 6s.)

THE BREAD OF TEARS.

By G. B. BURGIN.

The story is laid in Armenia, among missionaries and bandits and muleteers and effendis. Diamonds are stolen, and converts are "purchased." Part of the action takes place in Constantinople. The story is lively and uncommon, and is not wanting in serious interest. Mr. Burgin knows the East. (Long. 6s.)

THE GOLD STAR LINE.

By L. T. MEADE AND R. EUSTACE.

These are six stories told by the purser of a Gold Star Line vessel: stories of the kind to be found now in all the cheap magazines—"The Jewelled Cobra," "The Cypher with the Human Key," "The Sacred Chank," and so forth. "'And how long,' he continued, 'do you suppose it had been in the possession of the dead Malay?'" A dead Malay is part of the formula of all books of this character. (Ward, Lock & Co.)

NINETY NORTH.

By ERNEST WESTERN.

Ninety North is not a man's name: it means ninety degrees north, the arctic situation where the romance is laid. In that region the narrator lights upon a friendly leviathan named Mota, and a new race of beings who dwell in the Valley of Life, near the Mountain of the Dead, and sacrifice seals to the Great One, or Thunderer. The book is illustrated with views of Mota, who is something between an elephant and a walrus. (Burlleigh. 6s.)

CHATEL OR WIFE?

By CLAUD BRAY.

The question is asked of Maud Ashley, who, though loved by two Englishmen, married a Baboo named Mowlah Bux, and sank into her grave a broken woman. (Sands & Co. 6s.)

A LOST IDENTITY.

By J. D. HENNESSEY.

A story for those who like psychological mysteries. "Whether a large portion of his story was the raving of a madman, or whether . . . it was a glimpse into an hitherto unexplored avenue of the mysterious tripartite nature of man, time will reveal." (Warne & Co. 3s. 6d.)

A ROMAN MYSTERY.

By RICHARD BAGOT.

"There was the slightest possible inflexion of sarcasm in the Cardinal's voice as he spoke which Helen pretended not to perceive." Modern Rome, intrigue, titled people, and Italian tags. (Digby & Long. 6s.)

THE LOST EMERALDS OF ZARINTHIA.

By H. BEAUCHAMP.

"Was I really Harry Holdsworth, who had left London on a mission to the Grand Duke of Schleswig-Bohmerhausen? If so, where was my bag containing the precious jewels?" (Sands & Co. 3s. 6d.)

A LEGACY OF HATE.

By THEO. DOUGLAS.

A love-story that moves through tragedy to a satisfactory ending, if the marriage of a hero to the daughter of his own boyhood's sweetheart can be called satisfactory. (Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

GONE TO GROUND.

By G. F. UNDERHILL.

This is described as a hunting novel, but it tells also of love and burglary. (Sands & Co. 3s. 6d.)

AN AFRICAN TREASURE.

By J. MACLAREN COBBAN.

Nothing of sensation or picturesqueness is wanting to this story of treasure hunting in the Great Sahara. (John Long. 6s.)

GREEK PEASANT STORIES.

By NEIL WYNN WILLIAMS.

Otherwise, "Gleams and Glooms of Grecian Colour." These stories are well conceived and written. (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

THE KING OF CLADDACH.

By THOMAS FITZPATRICK.

A story of the Cromwellian occupation of Galway in 1652. Mr. Fitzpatrick mingles extracts from serious histories with his romance. (Sands & Co. 6s.)

In addition to the above we have received The Laird's Wooing, by J. Gordon Phillips (Unwin, 6s.); The Pilly-pingle Pastorals, by Druid Grayl (Greening, 3s. 6d.); The Tower of Dago, by Maurus Jókai (Sands, 3s. 6d.); A Mother's Holiday, by John Strange Winter (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.); Henry Worthington, Idealist, by Margaret Sherwood (The Macmillan Co., 6s.); A Broken Promise, by Violet Whyte (Pearson, Ltd., 3s. 6d.).

Hugo on Hugo.

To over-entitling one may object not less than to over-writing. In the work which Mr. Heinemann has just published, entitled The Memoirs of Victor Hugo, we have an example. From The Memoirs of Victor Hugo one expects more than an odd assortment of scraps from his note-book, jotted down from time to time as the mood took him, jumping from period to period with enormous gaps between. Reminiscences here, moralisings there, a choss vue, a conversation with Louis Philippe, a mordant anecdote of an actress, a diary kept during the siege of Paris—these are not enough to be styled “The Memoirs” of the most picturesque and restlessly vigorous intellectual force that this century produced, of a life lasting from 1802 until 1885. Over-entitling is perhaps among the lesser faults, but it is a fault.

When the book opens Hugo is twenty-three, already the author of Odes et Ballades and Hans d'Islande, and now a spectator, in company with Nodier, of the coronation of Charles X. at Rheims in 1825. We take leave of him in 1871 when he has still fourteen years of life. Throughout he is the same, always self-conscious, always in the front, always dramatic, always superbly Hugoesque.

Having said that, we have said practically all that is necessary. The scrap-book can then speak for itself. It is entertaining almost without cessation through all its four hundred pages; but it does not call for “review.”

Here is Hugo's elaborate ironical manner, from the note-book at Rheims in 1825. He practised it to the end, and to the end was ready on occasion to forget it too. He is writing of the cathedral:

One day I gazed down from the top of the tower through an embrasure. The entire façade sheered straight below me. I perceived in the depth, on top of a long stone support that extended down the wall directly beneath me to the escarpment, so that its form was lost, a sort of round basin. Rain-water had collected there and formed a narrow mirror at the bottom; there were also a tuft of grass with flowers in it, and a swallow's nest. Thus in a space only two feet in diameter were a lake, a garden, and a habitation—a bird's paradise. As I gazed the swallow was giving water to her brood. Round the upper edge of the basin were what looked like crenelles, and between these the swallow had built her nest. I examined these crenelles. They had the form of fleurs-de-lys. The support was a statue. This happy little world was the stone crown of an old king. And if God were asked: “Of what use was this Lothario, this Philip, this Charles, this Louis, this emperor, this king?” God peradventure would reply: “He had this statue made and lodged a swallow.”

The mood reappears later, but without its republicanism, when, one day in 1841, Hugo observed through the palisade fencing off the site of the old Vaudeville Theatre in the Rue de Chartres, which had been destroyed by fire, a little daisy growing among the blackened ruins. What a chance for the supreme sentimentalist! He rose to it with all his batteries in full action. And this is the conclusion of the reverie:

What a labyrinth is destiny, and what mysterious combinations there were that led up to the advent of this enchanting little yellow sun with its white rays. It required a theatre and a conflagration, which are the gaiety and the terror of a city, one of the most joyous inventions of man, and one of the most terrible visitations of God, bursts of laughter for thirty years and whirlwinds of flame for thirty hours to produce this Easter daisy, the delight of a gnat.

A session of the Academy in 1850 furnishes this pleasant scrap:

To-day, September 12, the Academy worked at the dictionary. Apropos of the word “increase,” this example, taken from the works of Mme. de Staël, was proposed:

“Poverty increases ignorance, and ignorance poverty.”

Three objections were immediately raised:

1. Antithesis.
2. Contemporary writer.
3. Dangerous thing to say.

The Academy rejected the example.

We might ally to this the description of Chateaubriand's wife from a later chapter:

When his wife died he attended the funeral service and returned laughing heartily—which, said Pilorge, was a proof that he was of weak mind. “A proof that he was in his right mind!” affirmed Edouard Bertin.

Mme. de Chateaubriand's benevolence was official, which did not prevent her from being a shrew at home. She founded a hospice—the Marie Thérèse Infirmary—visited the poor, succoured the sick, superintended crèches, gave alms, and prayed: at the same time she was harsh towards her husband, her relatives, her friends, and her servants, and was sour-tempered, stern, prudish, and a back-biter. God on high will take these things into account.

She was ugly, pitted with small-pox, had an enormous mouth, little eyes, was insignificant in appearance, and acted the grande dame, although she was rather the wife of a great man than of a great lord. By birth she was only the daughter of a ship-owner of Saint Malo. M. de Chateaubriand feared, detested, and cajoled her.

It was Chateaubriand who, one might say, invented Hugo; although Hugo was quick to register the patent himself, and exploit it to the full. Of Chateaubriand and Mme. Récamier Hugo writes:

M. de Chateaubriand, at the beginning of 1847, was a paralytic; Mme. Récamier was blind. Every day at three o'clock M. de Chateaubriand was carried to Mme. Récamier's beside. It was touching and sad. The woman who could no longer see stretched forth her hands gropingly towards the man who could no longer feel; their hands met, God be praised! Life was dying, but love still lived.

But these are minor matters. Hugo, the friend of kings and patron of princes, is the kernel of the book. Thus, in 1884, the note-book thus places Louis Philippe on record:

September 5, 1844.

The King rose, paced to and fro for a few moments, as though violently agitated, then came and sat beside me and said:

"Look here, you made a remark to Villemain that he reported to me. You said to him:

"The trouble between France and England apropos of Tahiti and Pritchard reminds me of a quarrel in a café between a couple of sub-lieutenants, one of whom has looked at the other in a way the latter does not like. A duel to the death is the result. But two great nations ought not to act like a couple of musketeers. Besides, in a duel to the death between two nations like England and France, it is civilisation that would be slain."

"This is really what you said, is it not?"

"Yes, Sire."

"I was greatly struck by your observation, and this very evening I reproduced it in a letter to a crowned head, for I frequently write all night long. I pass many a night doing over again what others have undone. I do not say anything about it. So far from being grateful to me they would only abuse me for it. Oh! yes, mine is hard work indeed. At my age, with my seventy-one years, I do not get an instant of real repose either by day or by night. I am always unquiet, and how can it be otherwise when I feel that I am the pivot upon which Europe revolves!"

Four years later we find this:

There entered my drawing-room in the Place Royale one morning in March, 1848, a man of medium height, about sixty-five or sixty-six years of age, dressed in black, a red and blue ribbon in his button-hole, and wearing patent-leather boots and white gloves. He was Jerome Napoleon, King of Westphalia.

He had a very gentle voice, a charming though somewhat timid smile, straight hair turning grey, and something of the profile of the Emperor.

He came to thank me for the permission that had been accorded to him to return to France, which he attributed to me, and begged me to get him appointed Governor of the Invalides. He told me that M. Crémieux, one of the members of the Provisional Government, had said to him the previous day:

"If Victor Hugo asks Lamartine to do it, it will be done. Formerly everything depended upon an interview between two emperors; now everything depends upon an interview between two poets."

"Tell M. Crémieux that it is he who is the poet," I replied to King Jerome with a smile.

Between 1850 and the Siege of Paris there is nothing. Not a word of Hugo's exile. But in 1870 he appears again on his way from Brussels to Paris. "En route I saw in the woods a camp of French soldiers, men and horses mingled. I shouted to them: 'Long live the Army'; and I wept." Paris is reached. "An immense crowd awaited me. It was an indescribable welcome. I spoke four times. . . . I said to the people: 'In one hour you repay me for twenty years of exile.'" Thenceforward all is triumph. Paris is besieged, but Hugo is in Paris: all is well. Yet he had opponents: "September 8.—I am warned that it is proposed to assassinate me. I shrug my shoulders." . . . "September 9.—The generals are asking me for commands. . . . September 20.—Nadar came to see me this evening to ask me for some letters to put in a balloon which he will send up the day after to-morrow. It will carry with it my three addresses: To the Germans, To Frenchmen, To Parisians." And so the game goes on. Hugo is thoroughly happy. His Châtiments are being sold in thousands and recited in the theatres; cannon and balloons are named after him; he weeps and exults. On October 9 five delegates from the Ninth Arrondissement call in the name of the Arrondissement to forbid him to get himself killed. On the day after he grants the Minister of Finance "an audience." On October 21 there is a rumour of the death of Dumas—"a large-hearted man of great talent." Incidentally we learn to what straits the Parisians were reduced for food. But Hugo does not suffer: the Directors of the Jardin des Plantes kill elephants and antelopes for him. He drops in also little remarks about his grand-daughter Jeanne: "Little Jeanne has imagined a way of puffing out her cheeks and raising her arms in the air that is adorable." In November Frédéric Lemaître calls, kisses Hugo's hands, and weeps.

Finally, let us quote this:

I copy the following from a newspaper:

"M. Victor Hugo had manifested the intention to leave Paris unarmed, with the artillery battery of the National Guard to which his two sons belong.

"The 144th Battalion of the National Guard went in a body to the poet's residence in the Avenue Frochot. Two delegates waited upon him.

"These honourable citizens went to forbid Victor Hugo to carry out his plan, which he had announced some time ago in his Address to the Germans.

"'Everybody can fight,' the deputation told him. 'But everybody cannot write Les Châtiments. Stay at home, therefore, and take care of a life that is so precious to France.'"

I do not remember the number of the battalion. It was not the 144th. Here are the terms of the address which was read to me by the major of the battalion:

"The National Guard of Paris forbids Victor Hugo to go to the front, inasmuch as everybody can go to the front, whereas Victor Hugo alone can do what Victor Hugo does."

"Forbids" is touching and charming.

The book, it will be seen, is very readable, very good fun, but it is not "the" memoirs of Victor Hugo.

Things Seen.

At the Free Library on Monday.

THE news-room was very full. Workpeople curtailed their dinner hour, and even children going home from school looked in to see the latest telegrams. Presently in came a small boy in sailor suit and muffin cap set well back on his head—so small was he that any attempt to read the newspapers on the high wooden stands was out of the question. He paused in the centre of the room, eagerly scanning the faces of the many readers as though trying to solve a difficult problem. Presently he trotted up to a tall man absorbed in the war telegrams. The child pulled him by the coat; then in a high whisper—"Will you lift me up? I want to see the list for mother!"

Every head was turned. The concentrated gaze of all the readers focussed upon the tall man as he lifted the little lad in his arms.

The child evidently could read, for his quick light eyes followed his stubby little forefinger as it travelled line by line down the long broken column of names. We all watched him breathlessly. The finger was lifted, he gave a little wriggle in the tall man's arms, exclaiming joyfully, "No! 'e ain't there"—and we felt that "'e" belonged to every one of us. "Mother won't never buy no paper till I bin and looked, for fear 'er should see it suddint-like. Thank you, sir!"

The tall man put the child down very gently.

Mr. Grant Allen.

MR. GRANT ALLEN died on Wednesday, after a long and very painful illness, at the age of fifty-one, thus closing one of the most interesting careers in modern literature. For Mr. Grant Allen was not one author but an epitome of authors: his works ranged from An American Millionaire to The Evolution of the Idea of God; from The Typewriter Girl (as we explain elsewhere) to Physiological Aesthetics; from The Woman Who Did to The Encyclopædia Britannica; from Strange Stories to The European Tour. He was a busy reviewer; he was for four years Professor of Logic at Queen's College, Jamaica; he did more to bring Darwin's discoveries to the popular understanding than anyone has them all under the prudent pseudonym of J. Arbuthnot Wilson. I do not know that I should have got much further on the downward path which leads to fiction, had it not been for the intervention of my good friend the late Mr. James Payn. When he undertook the editorship of the Cornhill, he determined at first to turn it into a magazine of stories only, and began to look about him for fresh blood to press into the service. Among the writers he then secured (I seem to recollect) were Dr. Conan Doyle and Mr. Stanley Weyman. Now, under Mr. Leslie Stephen's editorship, I had been accustomed to contribute to the Cornhill occasional papers on scientific subjects: and one morning, by an odd coincidence, I received two notes simultaneously from the new editor. The first of them was addressed to me by my real name; in it, Mr. Payn courteously but briefly informed me that he returned one such scientific article which I had sent for his done; he wrote charmingly, and always informingly, of the open air; he made the fame of Mr. William Watson; he was an uncompromising critic of social anomalies; he wrote good poetry; he was a tower of strength to the Strand Magazine, and he said that if he had his choice he would rather sweep a crossing than earn his living by the pen.

Within the past few days his edition of White's Selborne, a work on European travel, and a newly-arranged collection of his best stories have been published. The last-named book, Twelve Tales, with a Headpiece, a Tailpiece, and an Intermezzo, has an interesting account of Mr. Allen's story-telling career, from which we quote this passage:

I did not regard these my tentative tales in any serious light: and, fearing that they might stand in the way of such little scientific reputation as I possessed, I published consideration, as he had determined in future to exclude everything but fiction from the magazine—a decision which he afterwards saw reason to rescind. The second letter, forwarded through Messrs. Chatto & Windus, was addressed to me under my assumed name of J. Arbuthnot Wilson, and begged that unknown person to submit to Mr. Payn a few stories “like your admirable ‘Mr. Chung.’” . . . When a novelist like Mr. James Payn spoke well of my work—nay, more, desired to secure it for his practically new magazine—I began to think there might really be something in my stories worth following up by a more serious effort.

“The Reverend John Creedy,” which many judges consider Mr. Allen's masterpiece, occupies a prominent place in Twelve Tales.

We shall return next week to the more intimate and less-known side of Mr. Grant Allen's varied career.

Mrs. Humphry Ward on Charlotte Brontë.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD has written an interesting, if rather severe, introduction to Jane Eyre in Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.'s new edition of Charlotte Brontë's works. It is interesting to see what one novelist has to say about another novelist, especially when both are women. Mrs. Ward puts the faults of Jane Eyre forward first. Thus:

ROCHESTER AND JANE EYRE.
From the Picture by F. Walker, A.R.A.

There never was a plot, which pretended to be a plot, of looser texture than that of Jane Eyre. It abounds with absurdities and inconsistencies. The critics of Charlotte Brontë's time had no difficulty in pointing them out; they lie, indeed, on the surface for all to see. That such incidents should have happened to Jane Eyre in Mr. Rochester's house as did happen, without awakening her suspicions; that the existence of a lunatic should have been commonly known to all the servants of the house, yet wholly concealed from the governess; that Mr. Rochester should have been a man of honour and generosity, a man with whom not only Jane Eyre, but clearly the writer herself, is in love, and yet capable of deliberately betraying and deceiving a girl of twenty placed in a singularly helpless position—these are the fundamental puzzles of the story. Mrs. Fairfax is a mystery throughout. How, knowing what she did, did she not inevitably know more?—what was her real relation to Rochester?—to Jane Eyre? These are questions that no one can answer—out of the four corners of the book. The country-house party is a tissue of extravagance throughout; the sarcasms and brutalities of the beautiful Miss Ingram are no more credible than the manners assumed by the aristocratic Rochester from the beginning towards his ward's governess, or the amazing freedom with which he pours into the ears of the same governess—a virtuous girl of twenty, who has been no more than a few weeks under his roof—the story of his relations with Adèle's mother. . . . The country-house party is equally far from anything known, either to realistic or romantic truth, even to the truth as it existed in the days of Jane Eyre's Quarterly Reviewer and the Cowan Bridge School. . . . The whole scene from beginning to end is a piece of heavy grotesque, without either the truth or the fun of good satire. It was these pages, of course, and certain others like them in the book, that set George Henry Lewes preaching the "mild eyes," the "truth," and "finish" of Miss Austen to the new and stormy genius which had produced Jane Eyre. And one may see, perhaps, in Charlotte's soreness, in the very vehemence that she shows under this particular criticism, that, secretly, the shaft has gone home. . . . As to the other weaknesses of plot and conception, they are very obvious and very simple. The "arrangements" by which Jane Eyre is led to find a home in the Rivers household, and becomes at once her uncle's heiress and the good angel of her newly discovered cousins; the device of the phantom voice that recalls her to Rochester's side; the fire that destroys the mad wife, and delivers into Jane's hands a subdued and helpless Rochester—all these belong to that more mechanical and external sort of plot-making which the modern novelist of feeling and passion, as distinguished from the novelist of adventure, prides himself on renouncing. . . . In fact, to return to our advocatus diaboli, "Jane Eyre is, on the one side, a rather poor novel of incident, planned on the conventional pattern, and full of clumsy execution; on another side, it is a picture of passion and of ideas, for which, in truth, the writer had no sufficient equipment; she moves imprisoned, to quote Mr. Leslie Stephen, in 'a narrow circle of thoughts'; if you press it, the psychology of the book is really childish; Rochester is absurd; Jane Eyre, in spite of the stir that she makes, only half-realised and half-conscious."

Having almost endangered the new reader's appetite for Jane Eyre, Mrs. Ward proceeds to tell him how he may enjoy the novel:

The main secret of the charm that clings to Charlotte Brontë's books is, and will always be, the contact which they give us with her own fresh, indomitable, surprising personality—surprising, above all. In spite of its conventionalities of scheme, Jane Eyre has, in detail, in conversation, in the painting of character, that perpetual magic of the unexpected which overrides a thousand faults, and keeps the mood of the reader happy and alert. The expedients of the plot may irritate or chill the artistic sense; the voice of the story-teller, in its inflections of passion, or feeling, or reverie, charms and holds the ear almost from first to last. The general plan may be commonplace, the ideas even of no great profundity; but the book is original. How often in the early scenes of childhood or school-life does one instinctively expect the conventional solution, the conventional softening, the conventional prettiness or quaintness, that so many other story-tellers of undoubted talent could not have resisted! And it never comes. Hammer-like, the blows of a passionate realism descend. Jane Eyre, the little helpless child, is never comforted; Mrs. Reid, the cruel aunt, is never sorry for her cruelties; Bessie, the kind nurse, is not very kind, she does not break the impression, she satisfies no instinct of poetic compensation, she only just makes the story credible, the reader's assent possible. So, at Lowood, Helen Burns is not a suffering angel; there is nothing consciously pretty or touching in the wonderful picture of her: reality, with its discords, its infinite novelties, lends word and magic to the passion of Charlotte's memory of her dead sister; all is varied, living, poignant, full of the inexhaustible savour of truth, and warm with the fire of the heart. So that at last, when pure pathos comes, when Helen sleeps herself to death in Jane's arms, when the struggle is over, and room is made for softness, for pity, the mind of the reader yields itself wholly, without reserve, to the working of an artist so masterful, so self-contained, so rightly frugal as to the great words and great emotions of her art. We are in the presence of the same kind of power as that which drew the death of Bazarov in Fathers and Sons—a power which, in the regions covered by the experience of the mind behind it, "nothing common does nor mean," which shrinks from the borrowed and the imitated and the insincere as the patriot shrinks from treason.

Mrs. Ward draws some interesting comparisons and contrasts between Charlotte Brontë and George Sand, and maintains, with reason, that George Sand's novels quickened and fertilised the genius of her English sister. It was of a French critic, not of any English critic, that Charlotte Brontë said, referring to Shirley: "He follows Currer Bell through every winding, discerns every point, discriminates every shade, proves himself master of the subject, and lord of the aim."

The Amateur Critic.

[FROM time to time we receive letters from correspondents in praise or disapproval of books new and old. In future, for awhile, we propose to put a page of the ACADEMY at the service of the unprofessional critic. To this page we also invite our readers to contribute remarks on striking or curious passages which they may meet with in their ordinary reading. No communication, we would point out, must exceed 300 words.]

Good Writing v. Over-writing.

THE article in your last issue on "Over-writing" is much to my taste. I cannot endure these clever young men who think that the way to bring a scene home to the reader is to pile epithet upon epithet—the more extravagant the better. Passages that touch the imagination and live in the memory are always simple. Pater, Ruskin, Matthew Arnold never juggle with words. To make a passage "tell" the writer must have atmosphere, feeling, charm, and the "right" words. My contention may be right or wrong, but I could give you a score of passages in support of it. I will give you three, without comment, from books I have read during the past week. Each, I maintain, conveys an arresting picture, and the effect is gained by simple and legitimate means. My first is from Mr. G. W. Stevens's In India:

After that a group of naked fakirs, powdered white with ashes, with long matted hair and mad eyes. Then a door, fast closed and seeming to lead nowhither, with a tiny wreath of marigolds hung on it.

My second is from Mr. Conrad's new story in Blackwood's called "Lord Jim":

The old training-ship chained to her moorings quivered all over, bowing gently head to wind, and with her scanty rigging humming in a deep bass the breathless song of her youth at sea.

My third is from Mr. Cutcliffe Hyre's Further Adventures of Captain Kettle:

The steamer was outside, leaking steam at an anchorage, and sending out dazzling heliograms every time she rolled her bleached awnings in the sun. The pilot's boat, with her crew of savages, paddled towards her, down channels between the mangrove-planted islands. The water spurned up by the paddle blades was the colour of beer.

These examples may not be great writing, but they do their duty. They describe what the writer saw; and the reader, in his turn, sees the scene.

CHARLES QUARTERMAIN.

Mr. Chamberlain and Tennyson.

I OBSERVE that Mr. Chamberlain, in a recent letter to a correspondent who had sympathised with him under the attacks upon him which have lately been made, appears in the rôle of a Tennyson commentator. "I am afraid," he writes, "that where I am concerned there will always be people who impute the worst motives in regard to my actions. Tennyson says, 'Every man imputes himself'—that is to say, imputes to others the motives by which he knows he would himself be influenced." Having read this, I began to think about it, and quickly saw that Mr. Chamberlain was wrong, or, at least, not wholly right. I took my own case as an example—and a fair one, for I am not abnormal—and I found that my unhappy tendency is to impute to others precisely the motives by which I am not influenced. Hence it can be argued with equal force that persons are quite as ready to impute to others the faults which they themselves are not likely to commit. Tennyson's large generalisation can be met by Butler's couplet about compounding for sins we are inclined to by damning those we have no mind to.

'Eheu Fugaces.'

"G. S." writes: "I venture to send you a translation of the famous 14th Ode of Second Book of Horace, by, I believe, a professor of St. Andrews University, now dead. To the best of my knowledge it has never been published. When Mr. Gladstone was bringing out his metrical translation of the Roman poet I sent him a copy also, and he was pleased to acknowledge the receipt and to say: 'I quite agree in your view of the translation you have sent me, which appears to be highly felicitous.'"

How swift the years are gliding past,
My friend, be pious as you please,
Wrinkles and age must come at last,
And death in spite of bended knees.

Yes, you may slaughter every day
Three thousand bulls at Pluto's shrine,
Nor move the heartless king to stay
Your fate an hour for all your kine.

He holds, remember, in his grasp
Men, bigger men by far than you;
The Stygian waters firmly clasp
Their coils around a stronger crew.

When comes the time all men below
Must navigate that dismal ditch,
'Tis not the poor alone who go,
'Tis also, Postumus, the rich.

In vain you shun the bloody fight,
In vain avoid the tempest's roar,
And vainly in September's blight
Betake you to a healthier shore.

One scene which must be faced remains,
Of Acheron, the languid waters,
Of Sisyphus, the ceaseless pains,
Of Danaus, the damned daughters.

These you must visit, and for these Resign your lands, your pleasing wife,
Your household snug, and growing trees,
The pride and pleasure of your life.

None but the hated cypress tree
Will follow then their brief possessor,
And what a change, alas! shall be
When things have passed to your successor.

How quickly will that worthy set
Your hoarded vintages aflowing,
And make the rosy pavement wet
With wine beyond the pontiff's growing!

Catullus.

HAVING read your review of Mr. MacNaughton's Story of Catullus—which I had purchased on the day previous—it occurs to me that perhaps the enclosed translation of "Nil nimium studeo," &c., which I made about a year ago, might be of interest. This somewhat cumbersome result of much brain-cudgelling may at least serve to mark for contrast Mr. MacNaughton's beautifully facile and effective rendering of the same epigram. I append also in connexion with it a little opposition poem which the impertinence of Catullus evoked during my labours:

CATULLUS AD CÆSAREM.

Nor overmuch to meet demand of thine,
Cæsar, I aught incline:
Nor e'en what man thou art to care a jot—
Coloured, or white, or what!

INTERPRES AD EUNDEM.

Joy had been mine to serve thee, let me own, Cæsar! Nor mine to lack
Some loftier inquisition than alone
Which wert thou, white or black!

E. KNOX-LINTON.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE immediate increase of mourning in the dress of people passing along Pall Mall, tells its own tale of the fighting last Friday and Saturday in South Africa. The lists of casualties have differed in their wording about the wounded. The records of some regiments have been made explicit by adding "dangerously," "severely," and "slightly"; while the mere word "wounded," leaving vague terrors as to the worst, has been in the case of other regiments, in sole use. Accordingly, personally-made inquiries of wives, parents, and children of officers have been particularly persistent and painful all this week—a period of intolerable suspense—especially in cases where "wounded" might equally well mean a dislocated leg or the amputation of two limbs. The officials at the War Office have done their best under the trying position, and they have been able to point to the case of General Symons as showing that, at any rate, no attempt has been made at the other end to send flattering bulletins. Meanwhile, we do not need to wait for news of the progress of individuals to know that the officers have on this occasion suffered more than ever before—more than in the last Indian Frontier expedition even—in proportion to their men. That fact is significant. It marks the general social upheaval that has taken place since the days of the Crimean War, in which the men purposely stood in front of their officers to cover them. The order is now reversed, and the officers are on their mettle to set the example of courage to those whom they now lead in deed as well as in name. That, within proper bounds, is as it should be. "The gentlemen of England are the natural leaders of the people of England," as Lord Beaconsfield once observed.

NEPHEWS of the Lake Poets become almost an extinct race with the death of the Rev. Thomas Castle Southey, who left his native Cumberland for Warwickshire, where he held the vicarage of Newbold Pacey for thirty-five years. But he never forgot that he was the nephew of Southey, being the son of that brother of the Poet Laureate who died at sea, a naval captain fighting against the French. Indeed, it was a last tribute to that relationship that set the aged clergyman putting into rhymes, both English and Latin, only this year, his thoughts "In the Near Prospect of Death."

MRS. W. E. FORSTER, whose death took place the other day rather suddenly at her sister's, at Malvern, and not in the Yorkshire village in which she spent the last secluded years of her life, had not any very remarkable immediate history of her own; but she had relative interests of a commanding kind. She was Dr. Arnold's daughter, Matthew Arnold's sister, Forster's wife, and Mrs. Humphry Ward's aunt. The family calls upon her sympathies were, therefore, both large and varied; nor did she fail in her response to them. The gaunt courage of her husband when, as Chief Secretary for Ireland, he was compassed about by men sworn to take his life, had its counterpart in the quietness that was her strength. She began her married life with a certain bravery by wedding a member of the Society of Friends—an experiment, considered from various points of view. The poet who warns the woman to ask what her future husband's religion is, because she "will soon be of the same," did not take due count of feminine forces in matters of feelings, and a matter of feeling religion mostly is. Mrs. Forster made a good Anglican of her husband; but the depleted Society of Friends, while it crossed his name out of its book of life, always maintained a warm feeling, perhaps even a little pride, in the memory of the connexion. Dr. Arnold, too, was a great hero in those days in that sort of circle; and, if the young Bradford manufacturer was not to marry one of his own fellow-believers, it would rather see him marry Dr. Arnold's daughter than anybody else. There was one man, indeed, who never quite forgave Mr. Forster his defection, and that was Mr. Bright. Even when they sat in political triumph on the same bench, Bright's estimate of Forster in private life was anything but a cordial one; and even the way Forster sat on that bench—a very ungainly way it must be owned—was made a reproach against him by the statesman who, nevertheless, adhered to the Society which exists to protest against outward forms and ceremonies and symbols as signs of inward grace.

MRS. FORSTER lived to see her father's reputation somewhat decline. The High Church Movement, with its amazing sweep of everything before it, sensibly modified the ideals of parents about their children; more spirituality was demanded by religious directors; and Tom Brown has become now nearly as idiosyncratic a personage as Stalky. But there was no waning in the fame of her husband. The deviser as well as the passer of the Elementary Education Act of 1870 left a greater mark upon his century than was made by any of his contemporaries—that is beyond controversy; and his Irish policy, which is not beyond controversy, had its enormous temporary triumph, of which his wife took full share. The fame of her brother Matthew—only separated from her in age by a single year—she saw extend and intensify year by year, so that the cautious praises of him appearing in the Tennyson letters sounded to her a little cold and patronising. Her house in turn was a favourite haunt of her brother, and when they were absent from each other he wrote frequently to "K.," as he familiarly called her from childhood up, addressing to her, as "Fausta," his early verses on "Resignation."

[Sir Penn Symons determined that his first encounter with the Boers should be a British victory.—Daily Paper.]

Is Pen more mighty than is Sword?
Or sword than goose's feather?
No need for controversial word—
They're mightiest now together.

Mr. Bullen's Depreciatory Prefaces.

SIR,—Your (on the whole) kindly paragraph tempts me to offer just a word or two by way of apology. It may well be that I am, as you say, too modest; and, as that failing is not common, it is the more noticeable.

May I plead in extenuation that, having for thirty-three years been accustomed to the remarks that I was "no good, never would be good for anything," &c., it is by no means easy for me to grow accustomed to the wonderful stream of kindly words which literary organs of all shades (with the sole exception of the Athenæum) have turned upon me since the appearance of the Cruise of the Cachalot. I want, of course, to believe all the nice things they say, but I am constantly haunted by a fear that I am being over-rated. And I am in dread also of becoming swell-headed. That is no reason why I should rush into the opposite extreme and grovel. But, strange as it may appear, I really mean what I have said in my preface. I must remember not to say it any more.—I am, &c.,

September 23, 1899.

F. T. BULLEN.

[We did not doubt Mr. Bullen's sincerity. We merely wished to point out to him that the time for apologies was over. It is for readers to find an author good, not for an author to point to his shortcomings.]

Mr. Henty's Books.

SIR,—I wish to draw attention to a new form of publishing of which my publishers and myself have been the victims. My arrangements with Messrs. Blackie give them a monopoly of my books for boys, but do not include bona fide novels. The copyrights of the latter have, for the last twelve years, been sold to Messrs. Tillotson, of Bolton, who, after running them as serials in various British and other newspapers, have sold the book rights to London firms of publishers, who have brought them out either in three-volume or, latterly, in one-volume form, as novels. This season, however, three books that have so appeared have been again brought out, this time in the form and guise of boys' books. Two of these, Rujub the Juggler and Colonel Thorndyke's Secret, are published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus, and are got up in the closest imitation of those published by Messrs. Blackie. Messrs. Chatto & Windus have, in addition, put them in paper covers of the same tint as those issued by Messrs. Blackie, and with the titles printed in the shade of ink used by that firm, the imitation being so close that, when placed on a shelf together, they are practically identical. They even place them in their catalogue among "New Books for Boys."

The third volume is published by Messrs. S. W. Partridge & Co., who bought my book, A Woman of the Commune, from Messrs. F. V. White & Co., after the latter had published it as a novel, and have, in spite of my protest, altered the title to that of Cuthbert Hartington, following my name with the author of two boys' books brought out by Messrs. Blackie, thereby conveying the impression that it is a new book for boys. My publishers naturally complain that I have broken my agreement with them, and that the sale of these three books will seriously interfere with that of those they have brought out this season. Moreover, they are likely to injure my reputation as a writer of boys' books, as, being novels, they contain many scenes and episodes which would certainly not have found a place in books intended to be read by boys and girls.

As far as I am advised, I have no legal remedy; but I think that the public should be warned that in purchasing the volumes as presents for young people, they are not buying new books, still less my books for boys.—I am, &c.,

G. A. HENTY.

Travestying Herbert Spencer.

SIR,—Prof. Ward's brief rejoinder to my strictures on his Naturalism and Agnosticism, which appears in your last issue, is to me pleasant and satisfactory reading, for he takes exception to only one point in my indictment, and leaves it to be inferred that on all the others I have succeeded in palpably hitting the white. Besides, on the point which he singles out for notice, Prof. Ward does not improve his position, but, quite unwittingly no doubt, lends material support to my contention. Permit me in a few sentences to deal with the point at issue.

In my review I found fault with Prof. Ward for quoting a portion of a letter from Darwin to John Fiske, and leaving his readers to infer that that was Darwin's first and last verdict about Spencer. As there are several verdicts about Spencer in Darwin's Life and Letters—verdicts of a very different character from the one quoted by the Professor—I was, I think, justified in holding that it was wrong to single out one and say nothing about the rest. But the Professor does not dispute the existence of the other verdicts, as, indeed, he cannot, and thus far there is no difference between us. I, however, added in my review that Prof. Ward ought to have appealed from "Darwin knowing little to Darwin knowing more." This the Professor says he has done, the letter to John Fiske being, in his opinion, a verdict on Mr. Spencer's system as a whole, while the letter I quoted merely referred to an article by Mr. Spencer on certain strictures by Dr. Martineau on evolution—"a case (to use the Professor's own words) in which Darwin and Mr. Spencer had common ground."

I must candidly confess to having read that statement with raised eyebrows. In the article in question there is only a page or two devoted to rebutting Dr. Martineau's strictures on that particular part of the doctrine of Evolution which Darwin had in common with Mr. Spencer—namely, the origin of species; while all the rest are devoted to a defence of the general doctrine of evolution at large, with which Darwin had nothing whatever to do. So that while writing Mr. Spencer, Darwin was doing a great deal more than merely expressing admiration for a clever defence of common ground, and I am greatly surprised at Prof. Ward trying to represent the matter in a totally different light. Darwin frankly confesses, in the letter which Prof. Ward estimates so highly, that "Spencer's style is too hard for me," but when he did get over difficulties, and fully understood hard points, as he did in the case of the article on Dr. Martineau, he wrote to Mr. Spencer in terms of unbounded admiration. When, however, in his letter to John Fiske, he ventures timidly into wider regions, he would, I think, have been the first to admit that he was in the state I have designated, "Darwin knowing little."

There is not very much in this point, and had it stood alone I should not have deemed it worthy of notice; but it does not stand alone, and, therefore, I could not pass it over. It is, in fact, one out of many instances in which Prof. Ward practises something resembling what Sir Henry Maine calls imperfect generalisation—namely, the dropping out of sight of a certain number of particular facts, and constructing a formula which will embrace the remainder. Too frequently the Professor drops out of sight certain particular facts, and then gets along to his own intense satisfaction with the remainder. He must, therefore, excuse me for having felt obliged to enter a vigorous caveat against such a thoroughly partisan method.—I am, &c.,

WILLIAM C. McBAIN.

Renan.

SIR,—The accent gratuitously bestowed upon the second e of the good Bishop of Cambrai's name is still retained, with occasional exceptions, in English type, in spite of periodical protests in Notes and Queries and elsewhere. M. Renan is similarly endowed, his name being commonly pronounced and printed Rénan. But while the case of Fénelon seems well-nigh hopeless, it is not yet, perhaps, too late to save M. Renan's name from permanent mutilation. From "The Literary Week" of last Saturday's ACADEMY it appears that Mr. Henry James, in an article in the North American Review, speaks of Rénan (sic) as the last of the great historians. The fault may lie with the printer of the Review, or it may be that the ACADEMY is responsible. In the latter case, my criticism—useful, I hope it may prove, although microscopic—will be sure of the space I ask.—I am, &c., H. A.

Barnes, S.W.

[Mr. James is blameless.]

Misconceptions.

SIR,—Reading the recent correspondence on "Misconceptions," one cannot help being struck with the familiarity shown with the idea of a bear, a familiarity so marked as to overcome all consideration of grammar and sense, and of the existence of a very common verb employed with the same sound in more than one of its tenses, to say nothing of an equally common adjective.

To the stories of the "depths of ocean bear," the "child she-bear," and the "tom-bears lug" may be added one told by Sir M. E. Grant-Duff, premising, however, that the reading of Genesis to the old lady of the story must have been from the Revised Version, with which she may have been unacquainted. On hearing the list of children beginning "Uz his first-born, and Buz his brother," and ending "these eight did Milcah bear," she called out: "That can't be right. How could they milk a bear?"

What is the cause of this familiarity? Tradition tells us that the last wild bear in England made his appearance at the battle of Hastings. Tame bears are scarce. Bears are no longer baited. The makers of pomatum have ceased to announce: "Another fine bear slaughtered to-day." Yet only a few days ago Punch showed us a foreign member of a shooting party climbing up a tree on receiving the word, "Bear to your right"—a joke that would be pointless were the idea too absurd to be entertained by a reasonable foreign visitor.

The cause, I think, is to be found in the second chapter of the Second Book of Kings, where we read of Elisha cursing the little children who came to him with disrespectful language, and of the two she-bears who thereupon tore forty-two of them. This prompt punishment of improper behaviour to a prophet has been the theme of much pulpit eloquence; and the proverbial saying, "There you are again with your bears," is said to have been in the first instance the exclamation of an attendant on sermons who, after being fully instructed on the subject by one preacher, was chagrined to find himself shortly afterwards addressed to the same effect by another one. The story is calculated to make a deep impression on the infant mind, an impression which some guardians of infancy, with small pretension to being prophets, would be careful not to remove.—I am, &c., September 23, 1899.

W. R. LL.

SIR,—The Elegy is surely no more difficult for children than is the Church Catechism. What boy ever saw any meaning whatever in "a means whereby we receive the same, and a pledge to assure us thereof"? To me, as a child, the whole line underscored was a long single word. It had a luxurious sound that I liked, but præterea nihil. No language, how simple soever, I think, can escape a child's perversion. One said for years, in repeating the "Hail, Mary!" "Blessed art thou, a monk swimming." Another, supposing life was labour, I presume, ended his prayers with "forever endeavour, Amen."

The knowledge of literature will grow with the child; and when he appreciates what he has learned it is none the less welcome for being an old acquaintance.—I am, &c.,

An Earlier Version.

MISS JANE BARLOW writes: "As you mention in to-day's ACADEMY Mr. W. H. Mallock's rendering of part of Lucretius into the measure of FitzGerald's Omar Khayyâm, some of your readers might possibly be interested by a few quatrains of a version in that metre which I attempted several years ago:

'OMNI SOMNO SECURIUS.'

('De Rerum Natura,' Lib. iii., vv. 894-930.)

'Now must no more thy dear and gentle spouse
Greet thee returning to thy glad some house,
Nor pretty children run to snatch a kiss,
Thrilling thine heart with joy no word avows.

'No more must thou, thy loved one's guard and stay
In weal abide. Ah, piteous wight,' (they say)
'In piteous wise of all this sweet life's bliss
Bereft thou art by one bale-bringing day.'

Nor add thereto: 'Yet now endures in thee
No yearning after these'; tho' truth it be

That, clearly seen in thought, and shown in speech
From sore dismay and dread the soul should free.

'Thou, soothly, even as now in sleep of death
Lulled softly liest, thou shalt even so' (one saith)
'To furthest bound that lapsing time may reach Rest, quit of every pain that anguisheth.

'But we fast by thy pyre's grim funeral bed
O'er the poor ashes wept uncomfited,
Nor wept our fill; and never day shall break
Can soothe our life-long sorrowing for the dead.'

Ask of this mourner then: 'To easeful sleep,
If mortal doom but lead, rest calm and deep,
Ah! what so passing bitter thence can wake,
That one in dateless woe should pine and weep?'

This likewise oft men say from sad hearts' core,
Wreath-crowned and cup in hand their banquets o'er:
'Brief is the bliss that weakling mortals taste,
It is, and is not, and must return no more.'

As if, forsooth, in death our chiefest bane
Shall be that thirst and parching heat again
Vex us forlorn, or lingers uneffaced
Our longing after aught; delusion vain.

Since, mind and body alike in slumber stilled,
No man to self and life a waking willed,
Nor reck we tho' that sleep should last for aye,
By any longing after self unthrilled.

And yet not far from vibrant whirl sense-fraught
The primal atoms whence our frames be wrought
Have wandered, when the man casts slumber by,
And summons back his trance-dispersed thought.

Death, then, much less, if less than nought there were,
Can harm us, since its sleep doth wider bear
Our scattered elements, and who once hath known
That chill surcease of life awakeneth ne'er.

JANE BARLOW."

Our Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 5.

We offered a prize last week for the best translation of Heine's lyric:

ES STEHEN UNBEWEGLICH.

Es stehen unbeweglich
Die Sterne in der Höh'
Viel tausend Jahr', und schauen
Sich an mit Liebesweh.

Sie sprechen eine Sprache,
Die ist so reich, so schön;
Doch keiner der Philologen
Kann diese Sprache verstehn.

Ich aber hab' sie gelernt,
Und ich vergesse sie nicht;
Mir diente als Grammatik
Der Herzallerliebsten Gesicht.

The best of the very many versions which we have received is the following by Miss C. Thomson, Solihull, near Birmingham, to whom a cheque for a guinea has been sent:

Throughout the endless ages
The steadfast stars above
Gaze each at each with longing
And eyes of yearning love.

They speak a tender language,
That is so rich, so fair,
Yet never a philologist
This language can declare.

But I have studied and know it,
And ne'er forget its grace,
For the grammar whence I learnt it
Is my beloved's face.

A large number of competitors have gone astray with the last stanza, either inverting Heine's meaning, as in this specimen:

But I have learned that language,
Nor will forget it all,
For by its rules I learn to read
The dearest face of all;

or treating the last line as a figurative statement. Some consider it to mean "Heaven," some "the starry skies," and one translator applies it to "my wife." These are three of the best of the remaining versions:

Untravell'd and unchanging
The stars in heaven above
Through all eternity reflect
The agony of love.

And though they speak a language
Of matchless eloquence,
No dull grammarian may hope
To learn its accidence.

But I have solved for ever
The secret of the skies;
My lexicon the lovelight
In my beloved's eyes.

[N. P., London.]

All motionless, unchanging,
They stand, the stars above,
Through myriad years, each gazing
On each with aching love.

They speak a solemn language,
So beautiful, so grand,
Yet none of the philologists
That speech can understand.

But I, but I have learned it,
Each mood and tense and case,
The grammar that I studied
Was my beloved's face.

[W. G. F., Southsea.]

Standing for thousand ages,
Immovable above,
The stars behold each other
With painful longing love.

They speak in such a language,
So noble and so rich,
That no dry philologist
May understand their speech.

Yet I full well have learnt it,
But not from printed books;
I found its perfect grammar
In my beloved's looks.

Competition No. 6. (New Series.)

On page 491 will be found a letter signed Charles Quartermain, emphasising the power of simplicity rather than studied elaboration, to convey vivid, swift pictures. We ask for further examples of the art, to be drawn from prose writers, offering a prize of a guinea to the best which is sent in. No extract should exceed sixty words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, October 31. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 496 or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers.

READY ON NOVEMBER 8.

A MAID of the MOOR. By Mrs. M. E. STEVENSON, Author of "The Romance of a Grouse Moor," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

THE RED MEN of the DUSK. By John FINNEMORE, Author of "The Custom of the Country," &c. Illustrated by Lawson Wood. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

CUPID'S PUPILS. From Courtship to

Honeymoon. By One who has Assisted at Ten Thousand Three Hundred Marriages and Given Away Eleven Hundred and Twenty Brides. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

This book is not a work of fiction, drawn from the imagination, but a record of realities that passed under the notice of the writer. Few persons have been favoured with such ample opportunities of witnessing the peculiar eccentricities imported into the marriage ceremony and its accessories by nervous and unlettered individuals. The vagaries of those about to enter the holy bonds furnish both amusing and interesting reading.

Over 310,000 copies of this Book have been sold.

DAVID HARUM. A Story of American Life. By EDWARD NOYES WESTCOTT. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

THE BOOK OF THE YEAR.

THE FURTHER ADVENTURES of CAPTAIN KETTLE. By C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNÉ. Illustrated by Stanley

L. Wood. Crown 8vo, cloth, uniform with First Volume, price 6s.

"This delightful volume is likely to be not only one of the most read, but also one of the most talked of works of fiction issued during the autumn season. Unlike some of the fictional heroes whose names have become world-renowned, Captain Kettle's personality does not entirely dwarf those in his immediate vicinity; other characters there are to be found connected with his life history who are quite worth making acquaintance with."—World.

"Never has a hero won the heart of the public so spontaneously as this fire-eating little sailor whose name has become as familiar and as typical as Dickens's Captain Cuttle. Those who have read his early adventures will need no recommendation to follow his further career; those who have not, we strongly advise to repair the omission at once. What Lord Kitchener is in history, Captain Kettle is in fiction—the man of the year."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

WHEN ROGUES FALL OUT. By Joseph

HATTON, Author of "By Order of the Czar," &c. With Frontispiece by W. H. Margeson. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A graphic picture of certain aspects of life in Old London, and an exciting account of the adventures of a gentleman of fortune whose personality has fascinated thousands of readers since the story of his exploits was published for the first time. Mr. Hatton holds us to his pages with his quick change of incident."—Daily Telegraph.

"Not only has Mr. Hatton given us a thrilling romance of love and crime, but he has succeeded in presenting a vivid picture of London life a century ago. Though there is no avoidance of the picturesque sides of the career of famous rogues, the precariousness of their joys only serves to emphasise the lessons in virtue which more prosaic records of crime usually bring out."—Sheffield Independent.

HERONFORD. By S. R. Keightley, Author of "The Silver Cross," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

"Those who care to unravel a tangled skein of family interest, with twists and turns of crime, love, and passion, will here find something to their liking. The action takes place both on land and sea, and Dr. S. R. Keightley proves as competent to describe a fight on ocean as a ghost hunt in the great grey house of Heronford. Several of the characters are powerfully drawn, and become wonderfully human; but it is in action and colour-effects that Dr. Keightley shows the master hand, and he gives here some work as fine as any that has appeared since Stevenson."—Dundee Advertiser.

SIGNORS of the NIGHT. By Max

PEMBERTON, Author of "The Phantom Army," "Queen of the Jesters," &c. Illustrated by Harold Piffard. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

"The book gives a vivid picture of Venice at the dawn of the eighteenth century. The scenes are full of colour, and remind us of the wonderful paintings of Gentile Bellini in the Accademia. Every one who has seen Venice, and every one who longs to see it, will delight in Mr. Pemberton's stories."—British Weekly.

EDWARD FITZGERALD'S

RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM.

With the Original Persian Sources Collated from his own MSS. and literally Translated by EDWARD HERON-ALLEN.

Royal 8vo, xviii and 164 pp., bound in Persian green cloth and gold, 7s. 6d. [1899.

The object with which this volume was compiled was to set at rest, once and for ever, the vexed question of how far Edward FitzGerald's incomparable poem may be regarded as a translation of the Persian originals, how far as an adaptation, and how far as an original work.

The whole of the definitive (fifth) edition of FitzGerald's poem is included in the present volume, and also the stray quatrains that appeared in the Introduction and Notes to that poem, and those which appeared in the earlier editions of the poem and which have since been eliminated. Throughout the volume these appear on the left-hand pages, the right-hand pages being occupied by the Persian text of the original quatrains that inspired FitzGerald, together with a purely literal, line-for-line translation and references to the known texts in which they occur in identical or more or less varied forms.

 (Third Edition.)
 "Had anyone ever been disinclined to believe in Mr. Crockett's genius, he must have recanted and repented in sackcloth and ashes after enjoying 'Sweetheart Travellers.' It is the rarest of all rarities, and veritably a child's book for children, as well as for women and for men."—Times.
 "Mr. Crockett must be credited with one of the most pronounced successes of the season."—World.
 "One of the daintiest and most charming of gift-books."—Scotsman.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.
THE SURPRISING ADVENTURES of SIR TOADY LION, with those of GENERAL NAPOLEON SMITH. With numerous illustrations by Gordon Browne, R.L. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 6s.
 "When we say it is one of the most delightful stories about children we have ever read we are still short of the mark."—Daily Chronicle.
 "In this excellent book for children, which the elders will enjoy, Mr. Crockett comes right away from kailyard into a kingdom of obnoxious fancy, and is purely, delightfully funny, and not too Scotch.....
 Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations are as good a treat as the story."—World.

STORIES from the FAÏRIE QUEENE. By Mary Macleod.
 With Introduction by Professor HALES. Drawings by A. G. Walker, Sculptor. Large crown 8vo, art linen boards, gilt top, 6s.
 "Without exception the most admirable book of the kind which we have seen. The tales themselves from Spenser's inimitable allegory are daintily and vividly told, and the glamour of the old romance rests on each picturesque passing page.....The book is beautifully produced, and ought to satisfy the most fastidious and exacting taste."—Leeds Mercury.

A THRILLING ROMANCE BY A NEW WRITER.
I LIVED as I LISTED. By Alfred L. Maitland. With Etched Title and Frontispiece from a design by A. G. WALKER. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

BY THE POPULAR AUTHOR OF "THREE GIRLS IN A FLAT," "A HAUNTED TOWN," &c.

THREE GIRLS in a FLAT. By Ethel F. Heddle. Illustrated by Gordon Browne, R.L. (Second Edition.)

A HAUNTED TOWN. By Ethel F. Heddle. With Illustrations and Cover design by Gordon Browne, R.L. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards.
 "Lovers of St. Andrews will welcome this story, and as there is a great multitude scattered all over the world, the book ought to have the success which it certainly deserves. Miss Heddle is especially clever in weaving old history into the framework of a modern love-story. She knows the past of St. Andrews, and one can hear the footsteps of Queens and Cardinals still echoing among its haunted ruins, and in the old-world gardens behind the houses of South Street.....It is a beautiful book, and one on which the reviewer is tempted to linger. No sea town has a richer or more precious literature of its own than St. Andrews, and there are passages in this book well worthy to be placed beside the descriptions of Andrew Lang and Mrs. Oliphant."—British Weekly.

 with which the whole book is interspersed, and the concluding

 'The Transvaal from Within,' a book which seems to me to bear on every page and in every sentence the mark of truth, which the Government of the Transvaal reduced our fellow-countrymen there."

 Mr. Crane has written a story which is certain to last."

By ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

"I think that there can be no doubt that 'Rosamund' must be counted among the best work Mr. Swinburne has given us. It is striking, not merely as poetry, not merely for the many strong and beautiful lines which come so naturally to the tragic lips that speak them, but striking with its own proper excellence, that of drama. The figures and the action have a reality rare in the poetic drama."

RICHARD LE GALLIENNE, in the Star.

THE SHIP: HER STORY. By W. Clark RUSSELL. With 50 Illustrations by H. C. Seppings Wright. Small 4to, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

FOURTH EDITION OF

SIR WALTER BESANT'S GREAT LONDON NOVEL,

THE ORANGE GIRL. By Sir Walter

BESANT. Crown 8vo, cloth, with 8 Illustrations. 6s.
"The Orange Girl" is a delightful heroine, and the atmosphere surrounding her full of adventure and interest. She is a most fascinating creature. The story is written with all its author's nerve and power."—Vanity Fair.

"It would be difficult to find anything to say about Sir Walter Besant's new and picturesque eighteenth-century romance which has not been said before about many of its predecessors. His admirers may at any rate feel confident that 'The Orange Girl' shows little or no falling away from the standard of this writer's more recent works. Mr. Pogram's illustrations are decidedly pretty."—Queen.

"Jenny is one of those characters who take hold of us at once and inspire the reverence which perfect womanhood alone commands. Taking the story as a whole, it is rarely that we come across one that gives so little opening for criticism, or one that so completely captures the interest and sympathy of the reader."—Literary World.

TERENCE. By B. M. Croker. Crown 8vo, cloth, with 6 Illustrations, 6s.

"A spirited and romantic love-story. The pleasant Irish folk, with their brogue, their good nature, their unflinching wit, help to give charm and humour to a story that will satisfy the many admirers of Mrs. Croker's Irish tales."—Daily News.

"Terence" is delightful. It is full of Irish humour. The book is frankly human and droll. Mrs. Croker's hand has assuredly not lost its cunning."—Leeds Mercury.

"The book is so fresh, the dialogue so witty and amusing, that it is impossible to lay down the story without finishing it. Mrs. Croker has seldom done better work."—Daily Mail.

THE SOCIAL LIFE OF SCOTLAND IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

By the Rev. H. GREY GRAHAM.

"Beyond all question they constitute the most readable book dealing comprehensively with Scottish history that has been published for many years. These two volumes reproduce in a fashion and to an extent never before attempted town and country life in all its phases as it was lived in Scotland last century, and such chapters as 'The Land and the People,' 'Medical Art and Medical Practice,' and 'Crimes and Punishments' have all the charm and value of historical essays."—The Speaker.

"We can pay the author of these two volumes no higher compliment than by saying that, unless we are much mistaken, they will rank as a classic contribution to the history of Scotland."—The Daily Chronicle.

NATURALISM AND AGNOSTICISM

(THE GIFFORD LECTURES).

Delivered before the University of Aberdeen, in the Years 1896-98.

By JAMES WARD, Sc.D., Hon. LL.D., Edin.,
Professor of Mental Philosophy and Logic in the University of Cambridge.

"A work which does much to redeem Cambridge as a centre of philosophical thought, and which, if we mistake not, will prove one of the most important contributions to philosophy made in our time in England. Indeed, we are unable to think of any English work in which so complete a grasp both of science and philosophy is shown as in this remarkable treatise. If the Gifford bequest had given us this work only, its donor would have laid us under lasting obligations."—The Spectator.

"It cannot be doubted that it will have a wide influence on the higher thought of the country, and may even do something to restore to philosophy the prominent place it once occupied in English thought."—The Athenæum.

The Literary Week.

THE Daily Telegraph has seen fit to protest, in no measured terms, against a decree which prevents its correspondent at the seat of war from sending home messages of more than a few words at a time. When we contrast the masterly directness, clearness, and conciseness of Sir George White's despatch to the War Office concerning the calamity of the week, with the conflicting and vague reports of some of the numerous special correspondents, we cannot but feel that the interests of Englishmen at home might be better served if only the official telegrams were printed in the papers. We do not want the special correspondent to lose his occupation; we want him to be there, for his keen eye and picturesque pen are of the highest value when the story of the campaign comes to be written. But for that story we can wait. For all practical purposes, such despatches as Sir George White's models of good writing are enough.

SINCE our last number three poems on the war, signed by honoured names, have been made public. Dr. Alexander, the Archbishop of Armagh, contributed to the Times a copy of stately verses embodying the argument that "the ascending earthquake dust of battle frames God's pictures in the skies." It is an assurance of which many persons were in need. Mr. Alfred Austin, the Poet Laureate, is less admirable in some heroic couplets of comment upon England's fortitude under her reverse. The sentiments are correct, but they come two days late. An elaboration of a fact of this kind should follow immediately upon the disaster calling it forth. The poem by Mr. Kipling, which, we are delighted to see, is bringing such large sums to the Reservists' Fund, was called "The Absent-Minded Beggar," and is in the poet's Barrack Room manner. It deals with Mr. Thomas Atkins's proneness to leave his wife unprovided for. "The Absent-Minded Beggar" is probably destined to live long.

THE Proprietor of the ACADEMY has offered to the Daily Mail, in aid of the wives and children of British soldiers in South Africa, the sum of One Hundred Guineas for the original manuscript of Mr. Kipling's poem, "The Absent-Minded Beggar"; and the sum of Fifty Guineas for the original drawing by Mr. W. Caton Woodville of "Tommy." As everyone knows, the manuscript of Mr. Kipling's poem is offered by the Daily Mail to the highest bidder—the proceeds to go to the Lord Mayor's fund.

NOTWITHSTANDING the depression alleged to be perceptible in the publishing business, the date fixed for the appearance of The Life and Letters of Sir John Millais is November 7, and The Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson will be published on the 13th. Both these are books of a kind which, had there been any real depression, would certainly have been held over. Messrs. Methuen are issuing also a special limited edition of the Millais biography, containing twenty-two photogravure plates, printed on India paper, with duplicates of the same.

FROM the concluding instalment of R. L. Stevenson's Letters in Scribner's. To a young gentleman of the United States :

Whatever you do, read something else besides novels and newspapers; the first are good enough when they are good; the second, at their best, are worth nothing.

To Mr. Henley, concerning his Book of Verses :

I did not guess you were so great a magician; these are new tunes, this is an undertone of the true Apollo; these are not verse, they are poetry—inventions, creations, in language.

To Mr. J. M. Barrie, concerning A Window in Thrums :

Jess is beyond my frontier line; I could not touch her skirt; I have no such glamour of twilight on my pen. I am a capable artist; but it begins to look to me as if you were a man of genius. Take care of yourself for my sake. It's a devilish hard thing for a man who writes so many novels as I do, that I should get so few to read. And I can read yours and I love them.

THE fifth season of the Elizabethan Stage Society begins next week with a performance of Shakespeare's "Richard II."

IN his preface to the new edition of The Playactress and Mad Sir Uchtrede of the Hills Mr. Crockett stands out as one who can tell a good story against himself, and tell it well. Thus :

"Do you know Clashdaan?" said a friend of mine to a Galloway "herd" on the hills above the head of the Glen of Trool.

"Ay, brawly do I ken Clashdaan," was the reply; "it's juist a terrible place for sheep smoorin' amang the snaw, and if there's a storm onywhere amang the hills, the lichtnin' is sure to strike on Clashdaan."

"But," said my friend, thinking of "Sir Uchtrede," "have you read Mr. Crockett's story about it?"

"Na," said the shepherd, turning away, as if the subject were a painful one, "and mair nor that, I'm no gawn to read it either! If it gangs on like this, there will no be an auld runt of moss aik nor a bit rock by the roadside, but the craitur wull hae made up some lee aboot it! If ye ken the man, could ye no gie him a bit hint to try someither pairt o' the world an' gie Minnigaff a rest! I'm fair deeved wi' fowk askin' questions aboot this an' that in his buiks! And the crawlin' blasties never shut a gate ahint them, and think nocht o' knockin' a slap in a march-dyke that they may get through to look at some wee bit dub wi' a wheen sheep's banes intil't that he caa's a Murder Hole!"

A CURIOUS departure in publishing has been made by Mr. Edward Arnold. He sends us two volumes illustrating the flora of Palestine—Wild Flowers from Palestine and Pressed Flowers from the Holy Land—each of which is illustrated by dried specimens of actual flowers. Turning the pages, we notice two sprigs of mignonette, which the author, the Rev. Harvey B. Greene, ventures to associate with the hyssop of the Bible. "Purge me with mignonette and I shall be clean" has an odd ring. The lily of the field shown here is a rich crimson; but for beauty there is nothing to excel the white Madonna flower.

MR. JOHN MORLEY'S monograph on Oliver Cromwell begins in the November number of the Century. From the brief prologue with which the work opens—wherein, incidentally, we learn that Mr. Morley considers Prof. Goldwin Smith one of the most brilliant of living political critics—we quote the concluding sentences :

It is hard to deny that wherever force was useless Cromwell failed; or that his example would often lead in what modern opinion firmly judges to be false directions; or that it is in Milton and Bunyan, rather than in Cromwell, that we seek what was deepest, loftiest, and most abiding in Puritanism: we look to its apostles rather than its soldier. Yet Oliver's largeness of aim, his freedom of spirit, and that energy that comes of a free spirit; the presence of a burning light in his mind, though the light to our later times may have grown dim; his good faith, his valour, his constancy, have stamped his name, in spite of some exasperated acts that it is pure sophistry to justify, upon the imagination of men over all the vast area of the civilised world where the English tongue prevails.

The greatest names in history are those who, in a full career and amid the turbid extremities of political action, have yet touched closest and at most points the wide, ever-standing problems of the world, and the things in which men's interest never dies. Of this rare company Cromwell was surely one.

And here are a few other quotations from the essay :

His [Charles the First's] fault—and no statesman can have a worse—was that he never saw things as they were. He had taste, imagination, logic, but he was a dreamer, an idealist, and a theoriser, in which there might have been good rather than evil, if only his dreams, theories, and ideals had not been out of relation with the hard duties of a day of storm. He was gifted with a fine taste for pictures, and he had an unaffected passion for good literature. When he was a captive he devoted hours daily not only to Bishop Andrewes and the Ecclesiastical Polity of Hooker, but to Tasso, Ariosto, the Faerie Queene, and, above all, to Shakespeare.

He [Charles I.] had one ardent and constant sentiment, his devotion to the Queen. What a strange irony of the stars it was that threw the fortunes of a great kingdom at a deciding hour into the hands of a pedant of five-and-twenty and a foreign schoolgirl! France saw something like it a century later: Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, the Austrian, were neither of them twenty when they were called to regulate the fire-floods of the volcano.

To impose broad views upon the narrow is one of the things that a party-leader exists for.

THE American Academy of forty immortals which Literary Life is electing by public vote has now reached the following state. Historians: John Fiske, John Bach McMaster, Edward Eggleston, and A. T. Mahan. Essayists: T. W. Higginson and John Burroughs. Publicists: Theodore Roosevelt, George Dewey, and President McKinley. Philanthropist: Andrew Carnegie. Educators: Andrew D. White, David Starr Jordan, Benjamin Ide Wheeler, and Charles W. Eliot. Dramatists: Bronson Howard and David Belasco. Humorists: Mark Twain and either Joel Chandler Harris or Frank R. Stockton. Novelists: W. D. Howells, Mary Wilkins, S. Weir Mitchell, and F. Hopkinson Smith. Poets: E. C. Stedman, R. H. Stoddard, Joaquin Miller, and J. W. Riley. Critics: Hamilton W. Mabie and Brandes Matthews. Journalists: E. L. Godkin, Charles Emory Smith, and Whitelaw Reid. Ecclesiastic: Bishop Potter. Lawyers: Joseph H. Choate and William M. Ewerts. Scientists: Thomas A. Edison and Nikola Tesla. Painters: William M. Chase, John W. Alexander and Elihu Vedder. Sculptors: Augustus St. Gaudens and Frederick McMonnies. We cannot commend the discretion of the voters who have produced this Academy. The absence of the names of Charles Eliot Norton, William James, Bret Harte, Henry James, T. B. Aldrich, and John S. Sargent (who gets 2 votes to Mr. Chase's 22) is a sufficient sign of misguidedness. But the final figures have yet to come.

AMONG the grave absurdities in Mr. Stockton's new book, The Visier of the Two-Horned Alexander, is a whimsical parallel drawn between Maria Edgeworth and Nebuchadnezzar. The hero of the book, having acquired the secret of immortality during the time of Abraham, saw many famous personages during his protracted career, and happened to attend both the Babylonish king and the Irish novelist in the capacity of gardener. One afternoon, standing by his gardener, Nebuchadnezzar made use of precisely the same words which, twenty-four centuries later, under similar conditions, were made by Maria Edgeworth. They also had the same meditative expression of the eyes. This is amusing fooling, but the book is not altogether worthy of its author.

AN article in the Quarterly Review on Anglo-Indian novels reminds us that one of the earliest works of this character was by William Arnold, that brother of Matthew Arnold's whose death was the inspiration of the beautiful poem "A Southern Night." The novel, now forgotten, was entitled Oakfield, and was published in 1853. The story, says the Quarterly reviewer, was remarkable for the autobiographic description, too austere and censorious, of life in Indian cantonments, or during an Indian campaign, before the great Mutiny swept away the old sepoy army of Bengal. It represents the impression made upon a young Oxonian, of high culture and serious religious feeling, by the unmannerly and sometimes vicious dissipation of the officers' mess in an ill-managed regiment stationed up the country.

Nor long ago The Political Struwwelpeter arrived to blend politics with fun, and now comes The Nonsense Blue-Book, published from the office of the London Letter, the paper in which its contents first appeared. The Nonsense Blue-Book applies to current events the poetical and pictorial methods of Edward Lear. The author has caught the trick very cleverly, and some of the drawings and verses are very happy. Others are less so. For instance, in the lines—"There was a Bombastic Old Boer, Who thirsted for somebody's gore; So he said: 'Let us kick Women, children, and sick: That is safer than going to war,'" there is neither truth nor point.

IN the current number of the Dome may be found a little paper by Mr. W. B. Yeats, entitled "Dust hath Closed Helen's Eye," which shows that master of musical, wistful prose at his best. Therein he quotes an easy translation of an Irish folk-poem by Raftery, made in praise of the beautiful Mary Hynes, who died some sixty years ago in county Galway. As to how much of Mr. Yeats's story is true and how much exquisite fable we are not in a position to say. Perhaps he imagined it all. This is the end of Raftery's poem :

What is the worth of greatness till you have the light
Of the flower of the branch that is by your side?
There is no good to deny it or to try and hide it,
She is the sun in the heavens who wounded my heart.

There was no part of Ireland I did not travel,
From the rivers to the tops of the mountains,
To the edge of Lough Greine, whose mouth is hidden,
And I saw no beauty but was behind hers.

Her hair was shining and her brows were shining too;
Her face was like herself, her mouth pleasant and sweet.
She is the pride, and I give her the branch,
She is the shining flower of Baile-laoi.

It is Mary Hynes, the calm and easy woman,
Has beauty in her mind and in her face.
If a hundred clerks were gathered together,
They could not write down a half of her ways.

A man on the shore of Kinvara, who is too young to remember Mary Hynes, said: "Everybody says there is no one at all to be seen now so handsome, it is said she had beautiful hair the colour of gold. She was poor, but her clothes every day were the same as Sunday, she had such neatness. And if she went to any kind of a meeting, they would all be killing one another for a sight of her, and there were a great many in love with her, but she died young. It is said that no one that has a song made about them will ever live long."

WE have already drawn attention to the prosaic idiosyncrasies of the entertaining writer who has taken the pseudonym "Israfel." In the same number of the Dome he brings his freakish imagination to bear on Chopin. We make two extracts. This is one: "Through the cool white medium of the piano he produced tone colours of infinite variety and intensity, of a quite jewelled brilliancy—clear, sharp, and delicate. His chaste devotion to the piano kept him of necessity narrow and limited of resource in regard to effect, but he left no recess of the piano's possibilities unexplored; he was the Nansen of the arctic, glittering piano." And this the other: "Chopin's motto is the dreamer's motto: 'Jam yesterday and jam to-morrow, but never jam to-day. And especially jam yesterday!'"

THE late Charles Reade's Peg Woffington has now received the treatment hitherto kept for works of far gentler writers, such as Miss Austen and Oliver Goldsmith, Mrs. Gaskell and Sir Richard Steele—that is to say, the story has been illustrated by Mr. Hugh Thomson, supplied with a charming preface by Mr. Austin Dobson, and is served up by Mr. George Allen as a dainty Christmas book. It makes a very pretty one. For the most part Mr. Dobson's preface is concerned with Margaret Woffington, concerning whom he, of course, knows everything. Glancing through the book we come again on the table of Triplet's Facts and Triplet's Fiction. Thus:

TRIPLET'S FACTS.

A farthing dip is on the table.

It wants snuffing.

He jumped up, and snuffed it with his fingers. Burned his fingers, and swore a little.

TRIPLET'S FICTION.

A solitary candle cast its pale gleams around.

Its elongated wick betrayed an owner steeped in oblivion.

He rose languidly, and trimmed it with an instrument that he had by his side for that purpose, and muttered a silent ejaculation.

There are still too many novelists of the Triplet school.

MR. GEORGE ALLEN, the publisher of the new edition of Peg Woffington, sends us a letter addressed to Charles Reade, c/o Mr. George Allen, Charing Cross-road, which he has just received, asking that a firm of press-cutting agents may have the pleasure of supplying him with notices of his book. Whether such ignorance is real, or is assumed for purposes of advertisement, we cannot make up our mind.

THE Butterfly, in its new form, has now reached the substantial condition of a first annual volume. We cannot give it very high praise, for though much cleverness has gone to its making, that cleverness is often misguided. Many of the drawings here are deft and high-spirited, but they should never have left the portfolio. They illustrate, indeed, a modern tendency to hurl before the public eye experiments as well as real works. Once it was left for executors or chiffoniers to make public an artist's or author's tentative efforts. Mr. Sime has a strong individuality and much power of hand, but he has recently done better work, we think, than appears in this volume. The letterpress is only second-rate.

MR. HARDY's novels are now being clad by Messrs. Harper & Brothers in a cheaper dress at half-a-crown, the first volume being Far from the Madding Crowd. The same type and page arrangement as in the handsome six-shilling edition have been adopted, but the paper is slightly inferior, the frontispiece is missing, and the binding is less attractive. The new edition should find many owners.

IN Cornhill for November will be found a posthumous paper by the late James Payn which has, although we presume it to be new, a very familiar air. Possibly Mr. Payn, who often had something to say on this subject—"An Editor and Some Contributors"—repeated himself now and then. We quote some general reflections on editors and contributors:

The best editor is he who makes fewest mistakes. After all, though naturally the successful contributors excite greater interest, the less successful ones arouse more sympathy—if, at least, they have any merit in them. A dullard is out of place in literature, and should be courteously but firmly discouraged—here and there they make a hit—an "outer," never a "bull's eye"—and they think fame and fortune are within measurable distance, but they never see either.

Their pleadings would move a heart of adamant, but not an editor's. The reason is—and let all would-be contributors lay it to heart—that his magazine is not his own, but his proprietor's; he must be just before he is generous, because if otherwise he will be giving away other people's money—a very expensive sort of charity.

Mr. Payn's posthumous volume of essays, The Backwater of Life, is about to appear, with a preface by Mr. Leslie Stephen.

ONE of the first of the almanacks for 1900 which has reached us is "The Alice in Wonderland Calendar," issued by Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode. Every month is furnished with one of Sir John Tenniel's drawings printed in colour. In nurseries where they want to know what day of the month it is nothing could be better.

A CURIOUS enterprise now in full working order is the production of the Twentieth Century New Testament. This is an attempt to translate the original Greek into vivid, modern English. As the aim is essentially practical, not artistic or literary, we are not disposed to criticise the results obtained in the rendering of the Gospels, which is now complete. It is interesting to learn that the translators, who desire for the present to remain anonymous, are twenty University graduates. They have no pecuniary interest in the undertaking.

SOME years ago, Mr. W. T. Stead, finding that quite a number of people were simultaneously cherishing this idea of a modern New Testament, put them into communication with one another through the Review of Reviews. This led to the formation of the present Translation Company, but Mr. Stead himself has now no connexion with the work.

THE Literary Year Book for 1900 seems likely to be a better and more representative work than any of its predecessors. Mr. Herbert Morrah, the new editor, has obtained a series of articles dealing with the books of 1899 from well-known critics, including Mr. Henley, Mr. Lang, Mr. Quiller-Couch, Mr. G. W. E. Russell, M.P., and Mr. Joseph Jacobs. The rest of the book will be mainly information concerning the practical side of literature.

ELSEWHERE in this number will be found an article on the Russian novelist Turgenev, wherein Turgenev's opinion of Tolstoy is given. In a very interesting book, How Count L. N. Tolstoy Lives and Works, to which we shall return, a remark of Tolstoy's concerning Turgenev is recorded. Said the philosopher-novelist:

Some people wonder at Socrates who died and did not care to flee from prison. But is it not better to die consciously in fulfilment of one's duty than unexpectedly from some stupid bacteria? And I have always been surprised that so clever a man as Turgeneff should bear himself as he did toward death. He was awfully afraid of death. Is it even incomprehensible that he was not afraid to be afraid of death? And that darkness of reason was really astonishing in him! He and Prince D. D. Urusoff used to discuss religion, and Turgeneff used to dispute and dispute, and all of a sudden he would no longer be able to control himself, and would cover up his ears, and, pretending that he had forgotten Urusoff's name, would shout, "I won't listen any longer to that Prince Trubetzky."

And L. N. Tolstoy mimicked Turgeneff's voice until one would have thought the man was there in person.

Bibliographical.

NATURALLY a good deal has been said, during the last few days, about the late Miss Florence Marryat and her voluminous output as a novelist. Not so much has been remarked concerning her connexion with the stage, with which she was associated both as writer and as actress. I myself have seen her in Gilbert-Sullivan opera, though when and where I cannot now remember: it was "a-many years ago." The parts, I fancy, were Lady Sangazure in "The Sorcerer" and Lady Jane in "Patience." Miss Marryat had a physical presence which suited both those rôles. Her writing for the theatre was done, I think, mainly in collaboration, and included an adaptation of her own story, Her World Against a Lie. It does not seem to be generally known that she had a daughter who inherited some of her ability both as a novelist and as an actress. This lady—Miss Eva Ross-Church—have I also seen upon the "boards," and very promising she seemed. I believe she pre-deceased her mother, who, by the way, wrote a preface to Miss Ross-Church's work called An Actress's Love-Story, published in 1888. Miss Marryat utilised her knowledge of the stage in several of her fictions—notably in My Sister the Actress, Facing the Footlights, and Peerness and Player.

Miss Marryat turned out, for a long time past, about three stories a year. Miss Dora Russell, for whom a subscription is being raised, has been a fertile fictionist, though not so fertile, perhaps, as her sister-novelist. I find that in 1894 she published three tales, but they may not have been of the full-blown six-shilling order. I am not well acquainted with her work, but I believe she had, and has, a very large public, not only at the circulating libraries, but among newspaper readers; she has been much in demand as a "serialist." The titles of her stories all suggest matter which would appeal effectively to the fiction-lover. The Broken Seal, The Track of the Storm, The Secret of the River, A Bitter Birthright, The Last Signal, A Great Temptation (recalling, rather, Charles Reade's Terrible Temptation), The Hidden Chain, The Drift of Fate—these are all taking phrases. Her latest volume, apparently, was The Fatal Past, brought out three years ago. All writing people will sympathise with Miss Russell in her enforced rest from labour with the pen.

The fact that the Rev. Alfred J. Church is seventy years old sheds light upon the other fact that he is about to give us his autobiography. He has had a busy life in the threefold capacity of teacher, clergyman, and writer, and must have much to say that cannot fail to be interesting. He has been one of the most indefatigable book-makers of our time. Very little has come amiss to him. He is best known, no doubt, as the populariser of ancient history and literature and as a producer of tales for boys—these last being mainly on classical bases, though Mr. Church did pen a tale of Old English life which he called With the King at Oxford. Homer, Virgil, Livy, Herodotus, Lucian, Aristophanes, and many other classics were laid under contribution by him in various ways. But he also produced books on Carthage, the Rome of Cicero, and Early Britain; he showed in Isis and Ramosis, Summer Days on the Thames, and The Laureate's Country a feeling for nature as well as literature; and then we all remember the Horæ Tennysonianæ. He called his book of stories from Lucian The Greek Gulliver—the very name which Mr. Wynne Wilson, it will be seen, has bestowed upon his forthcoming translation of Lucian's Vera Historia.

The popularity of the late Rev. H. C. Adams as a writer of tales for the young was retained practically to the last. So lately as 1895 he published Fighting His Way and School and University, which were preceded in 1893 by In the Fifteen. There were new editions of his Hairbreadth Escapes in 1893, and of three of his stories in 1891. It is worth noting at this moment that he wrote a book on Perils in the Transvaal and Zululand (1887), and I may add that his Cyclopædia of Sacred Poetical Quotations is admittedly a useful work of reference. He was sometimes confused with Mr. H. G. Adams, though the two writers wrought in different fields.

The announcement of An Introduction [to?] and Commentary on Tennyson's "In Memoriam," from the pen of Prof. A. C. Bradley, reminds one of the fascination which the poem has always had for the expounders and the commentators. Was not Robertson of Brighton the first to present us with an Analysis of the work? Was that not followed by a Key to it, constructed by Dr. Gatty? And was not that, again, followed by a Companion to the poem, furnished by Mrs. E. R. Chapman? Lastly—one dare not say "finally"—there was the "study" which Mr. Joseph Jacobs made, and which he published some seven years ago under the title of Tennyson and "In Memoriam." One would not have thought that the work required all this wealth of explanation.

I note that Messrs. Macmillan are about to add Little Dorrit to their edition, necessarily incomplete, of Dickens's works. This edition is especially endeared to me by its handiness, and by the presence in it of the younger Charles Dickens's biographical and bibliographical introductions, which I cannot but think suggested the introductions written by Mrs. Ritchie for her father's books. In 1892 Messrs. Macmillan reproduced Barnaby Rudge, The Christmas Books, Dombey and Son, Martin Chuzzlewit, Nicholas Nickleby, Oliver Twist, Pickwick, and the Sketches by Boz, all prefaced by the author's son; and then, under the same auspices, came, in 1893, the American Notes, and, last year, The Old Curiosity Shop and Master Humphrey's Clock.

Yet another anthology! This time it is to consist of naval verse and other rhythmic matter relating to the sea. It is to figure in the "Canterbury Poets" series, from which I deduce that it will not in any way clash with a little volume already existing in that series, Sea Music: Poems and Passages Descriptive of the Sea. This came out in 1887; and so did a handsome book called Sea Song and River Rhyme, which included a stirring new poem by Mr. Swinburne. In the following year came Songs of the Waves. I take it that the forthcoming collection will consist mainly of songs of "life on the ocean wave," not devoting much space (if any) to the mere praise or description of the sea.

Mr. Wilson Barrett is quite distinguishing himself as a producer of prose fiction. He began by turning his play, "The Sign of the Cross," into a romance; then, with the help of Mr. Robert Hichens, he "novelized" another of his dramas, "The Daughters of Babylon." Now he is announced as part author, with Mr. Elwyn Barron, of a story entitled In Old New York, which will be published soon.

Mr. Gosse's Life of Donne.

Life and Letters of John Donne. For the First Time Revised and Collected by Edmund Gosse. 2 Vols. (Heinemann. 24s.)

A LIFE of Donne was needed which should (as Mr. Gosse says) be more than a mere tinkering of Izaak Walton; and we are thankful to Mr. Gosse for giving it us. It has become possible by the full collection we possess of

JOHN DONNE.

From a Drawing by G. Clint, A.R.A.

Donne's letters; and already Dr. Jessopp had given us an excellent little study of him as a theologian. The present volumes, indeed, were originally planned in conjunction with Dr. Jessopp; but Dr. Jessopp's distaste for Donne's poetry made collaboration difficult, and ultimately he made over to Mr. Gosse the entire task and all his own materials. So Mr. Gosse tells us in his Preface; and the years of study which he has given to the making of these volumes have been worthily expended. The result is a book written with love and devotion, full of various literary and personal interest, and marked by unfailing appreciation. In particular, his wide range of literary sympathy peculiarly fits him to point out both the derivations and the originality of Donne, most learned yet independent of writers.

A brilliant and unique figure is Donne. A Protestant Bishop, of stubborn Catholic stock; an amatory poet, full of mysticism and scholasticism; a wit, a courtier, a man of the world; to the last shrinking from the ecclesiastical state with the reluctant avoidance of a Thomas à-Becket, yet ultimately the most famous of preachers and a voluminous theological writer; beginning with verse not doubtfully licentious, and ending with a death of ascetic piety. He, like Chaucer and Milton, was among the illustrious London-born. His father was a Catholic, of doubly Catholic lineage; and it was not till after his Oxford days and his mother's death that Donne renounced his ancestral faith. For a time, as Mr. Gosse acutely reasons, he probably was indifferent to any fixed creed. But at Oxford he had doubtless imbibed his attraction towards mysticism. Mr. Gosse shows that the writings of the Spanish mystics were in the ascendant at the University. They had been introduced there by Luis Vives, tutor to Katharine of Arragon, and Professor of Humanities at Oxford. Francis Meres (well known to students of Shakespeare) had translated Fray Luis de Granada. And it was the age of St. Teresa and St. John of the Cross.

Yet Donne's first poems were the reverse of what such influences might beget—they were satires, and among the very earliest of English satires, in the formal sense of the word. It was 1593, and he was then twenty; yet he was a satirist before Hall, and after the languid attempt of Lodge. Already he was himself, and utterly unlike the Spensers, Daniels, and the rest who furnished models for the young Shakespeare about this date. Mr. Gosse's investigation as to the derivation of the satires therefore becomes of extreme interest. He shows that, probably owing to the authority exerted by the lectures of Casaubon at Geneva, Persius was the special model of the earlier English satirists. Moreover, it was Persius peculiarly understood. Crabbedness both of style and metre were supposed to be leading features of the old Roman poet, and therefore essential features of satire itself. It was accordingly of deliberate endeavour that Donne darkened his language and knotted his versification. The point is valuable, for these characters more or less clung to Donne ever afterwards. If you examine their extreme form in the satires, they depend on two things: violent ellipsis as regards sentence-structure; violent elision and wilful accentuation as regards metre. The unusual accentuation is sometimes found to be highly expressive, when you consider it; sometimes is purely wanton and defiant. The like traits disturb the reader, in less persistent measure, throughout Donne's best work; yet when he is not bent on being too clever, he can show verse as sinewily knit, as harmonious, or as melodious as anything in his great predecessors or contemporaries. Mr. Gosse has done good service in pointing out what (apart from temperament) is probably the source of this mannerism, and that it was deliberately introduced as a protest against "the rosy Elizabethan sweetness." To this he soon added the use of imagery drawn from familiar, technical, or scholastic sources. The result is a style quite personal to himself, which his brilliant vogue at Court was powerless to alter. On the contrary, he became himself the leader of a school destined to overrun the whole field of seventeenth century poetry.

Donne's verse, as Mr. Gosse truly says, differs from most Elizabethan verse in being strongly personal. He anticipated the modern habit of making his poetry a record of his own feelings and experience. We have in it the express image of a lawless, curious, headstrong youth, trying all life, searching all knowledge, experimenting in all pleasure. He was a rake, if you can call a man a rake who is a master of law, a proficient in theology. He was a student, if you can call a man a student when he is a kind of strong and self-contained Sydney Carton who combined hard living and high thinking. You have the forcible turbulent mind in the strongly knit turbid verse, with its restless activity of fancy, its directness of feeling contrasting with the strangeness of expression. But with all its intellectual brilliancy, Donne's poetry was hard, until a legitimate love affair came to inform it with depth and height of feeling.

Of course, he fell in love in a forbidden quarter; and yet more of course he pursued the affair to marriage through every obstacle. It was at once the making and marring of Donne. Morally and poetically it was the best thing which could have happened to him; but it was the ruin of his fortune. At this time the able and ambitious young lawyer was secretary to the Lord Keeper Egerton, with brilliant prospects and a host of debts. The lady with whom he fell in love was Anne More, niece to Lady Egerton, and daughter of Sir George More of Losely, Chancellor of the Garter and Lieutenant of the Tower. The affair was discovered and prohibited; but after a period of separation the lovers contracted a clandestine marriage. Sir George More was furious. He threw Donne into prison; he procured his dismissal from the Lord Keeper's service, and got a Special Commission appointed to examine the validity of the marriage. By tactful submission, and the intercession of ladies of high rank, who were taken with the young secretary, Sir George More was at last brought round. Donne was set free from prison, and Sir George asked the Keeper to take him back as secretary; but Egerton, who had dismissed Donne very unwillingly, could not chop and change to suit a choleric father-in-law. He replied, with regret for what had been done, that it was not for "his place and credit to discharge and readmit servants at the request of passionate petitioners."

From this time Donne's secular prospects were at an end. Only as an ecclesiastic could he get any advancement under James I.; yet he held out against the necessity as long as possible. When every resource had been tried, and hope exhausted, then alone did he take the irrevocable step which put an end to his lay ambitions, and led to the Deanery of St. Paul's. But once the step was taken, he threw himself into his new duties with characteristic concentration. Thenceforth we have a new Donne. Not only does there arise Donne the great preacher, which might be a merely outward change. His life grows steadily more ascetic; his prose gives curious and brilliant testimony to his new preoccupations; and, above all, his poetry (with Donne ever the sincere index of the soul) becomes surcharged with profound religiousness. The sermons and prose-writings of this later period are little read nowadays; even Mr. Gosse finds their admixture of scholasticism intolerable, and that you must disencumber them from it to enjoy them. But minds which love intellectual subtlety will find them a delightful exercise, and may even swallow the scholasticism. His mind retained its power to the very last. On his death-bed, emaciated by wearing sickness, he wrote a poem as strong and characteristic as ever he wrote. Those closing days remind one of the mystics whom he loved, with a touch of fantastic personality which is his own, and not altogether pleasing. The story of his memorial in St. Paul's is well known, but it will bear retelling. When he was asked, in his last illness, to sit for it, he consented, but on condition that it should be done in his own way. Old Walton tells what followed:

Dr. Donne sent for a carver to make for him in wood the figure of an urn . . . and to bring with it a board of the just height of his body. These being got, then without delay a choice painter was got to be in readiness to draw his picture, which was taken as followeth. Several charcoal fires being first made in his large study, he brought with him into the place his winding-sheet in his hand, and having put off all his clothes, had this sheet put on him, and so tied with knots at his head and feet, and his hands so placed as dead bodies are usually fitted, to be shrouded and put into their coffin or grave. Upon this urn he then stood, with his eyes shut, and with so much of the sheet turned aside as might show his lean, pale, and deathlike face, which was purposely turned towards the east, from whence he expected the second coming of his and our Saviour Jesus. In this posture he was drawn at his just height; and when the picture was fully finished, he caused it to be set by his bedside, where it continued and became his hourly object till his death.

So Donne was Donne to the last.

His poetry, long forgotten, has in our days again become an influence with poets and students, if not with general readers. In spite of the faults already noted, in spite of its perverse ingenuities, it has at its best a strength of expression, a close-knit structure, a felicity of balance, a subtle perception of analogy, and a personal sincerity, which appeal irresistibly to strong minds. And now and again he breaks into a directness of powerfully-felt utterance which reminds one of the very greatest Elizabethans. How Shakespearean is this opening of one little poem:

So, go, break off this last lamenting kiss,
Which sucks two souls, and vapours both away;
Turn, thou ghost, that way, and let me turn this,
And let ourselves benight our happiest day.

Once, in the Epithalamium on the marriage of Princess Elizabeth with the Elector Palatine, he has an outburst of such fresh and open song as shows he might have been great in a more natural style than he adopted:

Hail, Bishop Valentine, whose day this is;
All the air is thy diocese,
And all the chirping choristers
And other birds are thy parishioners:
Thou marriest every year
The lyric lark, and the grave whispering dove,
The sparrow that neglects his life for love,
The household bird with the red stomacher;
Thou mak'st the blackbird speed as soon
As doth the goldfinch or the halcyon;
The husband-cock looks out, and straight is sped,
And meets his wife, who brings her feather-bed;
This day more cheerfully than ever shine;
This day, which might inflame thyself, old Valentine!

That is exquisite, and might have been written yesterday. One can well understand that Browning was attracted by so kindred a mind; though personally we do not see the resemblance in style which Mr. Gosse detects between the two.

Mr. Gosse is to be thanked for a Life which should become classical. The copious correspondence which he prints would alone make the book invaluable: though we do not find Donne a very attractive or stimulating letter-writer. And the background is presented with such skill, events, writings, and comments are so artistically interwoven, with so much charm of manner, as to make these two volumes fascinating reading.

A Primer on Compromise.

The Map of Life. By W. E. H. Lecky. (Longmans & Co. 10s. 6d.)

WE have not found a single page of Mr. Lecky's book tedious; once or twice our pace slackened a little in the chapter on Marriage, but Mr. Lecky's style has so many alluring qualities that we never felt the slightest inclination to abandon the reading when thought gave out, or was trivial. Besides, no one knows better than the historian of the Eighteenth Century how to hold the mean between too much detail and too little, so that he compels and sustains attention with an easy-forcibleness quite apart from the subject-matter or the ideas. But style is not everything, and in a book of this kind the purely literary charm cannot be allowed to weigh with us in our final estimate of its value. Mr. Lecky's style to-day is what it was thirty years ago—his first two books dealing with rationalism and morals were published respectively in 1865 and 1869—only mellowed and not quite so robust. To some, writing becomes by practice a mechanical exercise, and long after mental senescence has set in the power of expression may remain intact; therefore we waive the question of style.

The real worth of The Map of Life lies in its giving us briefly—too briefly, we think—the Philosophy of Compromise as understood by Mr. Lecky. We would willingly have spared the moralisings on success, time, and happiness for a fuller treatment of this subject. Instead of being a treatise, it is a primer—a quite admirable primer, it is true, but our desire has been whetted for a more complete survey of the field.

It is remarkable how early in life the historian of the eighteenth century attained his intellectual zenith. This book merely summarises the teaching which is scattered up and down the author's other volumes; what is new is the illustrative matter. We do not say this in depreciation; but it is surely rather unusual that a mind of Mr. Lecky's complexion, which considers each question of conduct or policy on its merits, should not, by the enforced mental activity which this habit necessitates, have strengthened with his years, and culminated late. Mr. Lecky shows himself in all his works so anxious to discover the truth, that he cannot fail to evoke sympathy even from those with whose ideals he has nothing in common. In this review we refer mainly to those parts of his book which have some bearing on compromise.

Let us begin with a very difficult subject—war. It must be confessed that on this topic Mr. Lecky is not very satisfactory, although no one could be more alive than he to the horrors which accompany and follow international conflict:

In modern times the danger lies less in the intrigues of statesmen than in deeply-seated international jealousies and antipathies, in sudden volcanic outbursts of popular passion. After 1,800 years' profession of the creed of peace, Christendom is an armed camp. Never, or hardly ever, in times of peace had the mere preparations of war absorbed so large a proportion of its population and resources; and very seldom has so large an amount of its ability been mainly employed in inventing and in perfecting instruments of destruction. Those who will look on the world without illusion will be compelled to admit that the chief guarantees for its peace are to be found much less in moral than in purely selfish motives. The financial embarrassments of the great nations, their profound distrust of one another, the vast cost of modern war, the gigantic commercial disasters it inevitably entails, the extreme uncertainty of its issue, the utter ruin that may follow defeat—these are the real influences that restrain the tiger passions and the avaricious cravings of mankind.

Again, he writes: "War undertaken without necessity, or at least without serious justification, is according to all sound ethics the gravest of crimes." Now these two typical passages are sufficient for our purpose. Mr. Lecky, it will be observed, does not tell us when war is justifiable, and what are the principles of "all sound ethics" which show it to be "the gravest of crimes" if entered upon "without necessity." Is it not strange that an author who is the supreme authority on the century in which we went to war with France for the possession, as Mr. Seeley proves in The Expansion of England, of the markets of the world should put us off in this way? He might have given us the results of his thinking on the question of arbitration and international law, or he might have investigated the relation between international and individual ethics. And, seeing that the relations between foreign policy and trade are admitted by all to be very close, are we not justified in asking Mr. Lecky to give us guidance?

Let us turn to Mr. Lecky's treatment of purely domestic and economic questions. It is, of course, well known that the author of Democracy and Liberty is of the opinion that the tendency of modern legislation is to shift the responsibility from the individual to the State, to confiscate private property, to make light of contracts, to curtail seriously individual liberty, and, generally, to bring about the undermining of all those institutions which are our pride and the earnest of our continuance as a great nation. And in this indictment he does not stand alone. Mr. Herbert Spencer has told us that the triumph of collectivism means the return of a military despotism and the necessary withdrawal of all social rights. Other recent critics, like M. Gustave Le Bon and Mr. Mallock, take up the parable. While admitting that these writers are doing democratic nations good service in pointing out tendencies in national life which are clearly inimical to national well-being, we cannot help observing that it has yet to be proved that the vices of modern States can be directly or indirectly traced to the increased activity of restrictive legislation: and, further, how few realise the power of the minority to make its protests effective. An example will suffice: vaccination is now non-compulsory simply through the efforts made by a very small minority.

Mr. Lecky repeats the hoary fallacy that sanitary science, in saving the weak, who will grow up and propagate, is not an unmixed good. Clearly the answer to this is that the same science which saves the weak from death will save others from a low vitality.

The Land Act of 1880 is anathema to Mr. Lecky because it empowered the Land Commissioners to tear up a valid contract and substitute for it another less favourable to the tenant. Suppose it could be proved that the tenants benefited out of all proportion to the loss incurred by the landlords, would not this be an application of the principle of compromise to which our author is committed? Perhaps this is a case in which compromise under no circumstances is permissible. Well, then, we ask, Why? Mr. Lecky views with alarm the growing tendency of the State to interfere in the relations between employers and employés, although he admits that one of the gravest dangers threatening our political life is the multiplication of fortunes realised by shareholders and others, who have no practical control over or interest in those from whom their fortunes are derived. Are we to infer that Mr. Lecky would be favourable to any legislation which should attempt to increase the responsibilities of the rich?

On Temperance we read that "not many men who have had any practical experience in the management of men would advocate a complete suppression of the drink trade, and still fewer would put it on the basis of complete free trade, altogether exempt from special legislative restrictions." This is very sane, as is also the advice that politicians must put on restrictions, provided that they are supported by a genuine public opinion. This is wise compromise, and we find ourselves in complete agreement with Mr. Lecky in approving of compulsory education and in severely restricting child labour even against the wishes of the parent. The theory that in the State taking upon itself the responsibility which rightly should rest on the parent it is doing more harm than good may be answered in the words of a well-known economist: "We do not hesitate to apply compulsion whenever we are quite satisfied that a body of persons exists who can pronounce authoritatively as to what is good for humanity at large." We believe that Mr. Lecky would readily subscribe to this principle.

The business of politicians and of citizens is to make themselves acquainted with "expert" evidence in some province of economics and to do their best to create opinion, and to promote, when the time is ripe for it, legislation, in the hope that the unconvinced minority will be brought to see that the majority was right. We continually forget that the law sometimes acts as a schoolmaster leading us to morality. Mr. Lecky's analysis of "party" ethics, and the relation of the individual member to his party and to his constituency, must prove very instructive to those who are just beginning to feel after these things. His opinions with respect to Maynooth College are well known. He concludes a most lucid exposition of the considerations which should weigh with statesmen in words which carry conviction:

Slowly and very reluctantly governments in England have come to recognise the fact that the trend of Catholic opinion in Ireland is as clearly in the direction of denominationalism as the trend of Nonconformist English opinion is in the direction of undenominationalism, and that it is impossible to carry on the education of a priest-ridden Catholic party on the same lines as a Protestant one. Primary education has become almost absolutely denominational, and, directly or indirectly, a crowd of endowments are given to exclusively Catholic institutions. On such grounds many who entertain the strongest antipathy to the priestly control of higher education are prepared to advocate an increased endowment of some university or college which is distinctly sacerdotal, while strenuously upholding side by side with it the undenominational institutions which they believe to be incomparably better, and which are at present resorted to not only by all Protestants, but also by a not inconsiderable body of Irish Catholics.

The fact is, we cannot help supporting institutions the aim of which may be wholly alien to all the principles which we hold very dear; accordingly, a wise people and a wise government will continually watch over the interests of the minority. We have not referred to Mr. Lecky's teaching relative to the Church of England; but we might say that he is much opposed to the Ritualist practices, which if allowed to spread will, he thinks, alter its whole character, and bring about a speedy disestablishment.

The last chapter in the book is a very beautiful essay on Christian stoicism:

Vague notions, however, of a dim, twilight, shadowy world, where the ghosts of the dead lived a faint and joyless existence, and from whence they sometimes returned to haunt the living in their dreams, were widely spread through the popular imaginations, and it was as the extinction of all superstitious fears that the school of Lucretius and Pliny welcomed the belief that all things ended with death: "Post mortem nihil est, ipsaque mors nihil." Nor is it by any means certain that even in the school of Plato the thought of another life had a great and operative influence on minds and characters. Death was chiefly represented as rest; as the close of a banquet; as the universal law of nature which befalls all living beings, though the immense majority encounter it at an earlier period than man. It was thought of simply as sleep—dreamless, undisturbed sleep—the final release from all the sorrows, sufferings, anxieties, and labours and longings of life.

An admirable book, and its closing words are as kindly and placid as a windless autumn night.

Gentlemen of England.

The Reminiscences and Recollections of Captain Gronow.
1810-1860. New edition. 2 vols. (John C. Nimmo. 12s.)

At a time when English officers are to-day walking Piccadilly, careful of their cravats and nice about their boots, and to-morrow are being buried under the sopping grass of the Veldt, one returns to Captain Gronow's pages with emotion. For this is the book of dandy heroes, and this is the book of elegance and blood. Captain Gronow was himself "one of the prettiest dandy officers of proud Albion, and for years his miniature portrait was secretly carried about by a great princess who was madly in love with him. And sometimes when a fashionable beauty was passing he was observed carelessly opening the red morocco case in which he found again the souvenirs of his youth and his successes; then he sighed and shut it again." He was so given to sucking the top of his gold-headed cane that it was made a wager that he slept in this attitude. Yet Gronow was a soldier to the finger-tips. Not Brummel's ties, not Alvanley's wit, not Byron's talk, not Catalina's songs, not Wattier's dinners could detain him from the wars. When Wellington was at Brussels in 1815, and Gronow found himself left ingloriously in London with the 2nd Battalion of the Guards, his soul rose above parades and discipline. He begged a friend to intercede for him to Sir Thomas Picton, who was going to Brussels with his aides-de-camp. Picton said that the "lad" might come with him if he could obtain leave. Gronow had neither leave nor money for his outfit. He went to Cox and Greenwood, the military bankers, and borrowed £200. Then he took this inadequate sum to a gambling-house in St. James's-square and won £600 in an evening. Having purchased two superb horses at Tattersall's and all his paraphernalia, he embarked for Ostend. Even now he had not obtained leave, but he calculated that he could see the great battle and return in time to mount guard at St. James's.

The party sailed from Ramsgate, and arrived at their destination the same evening. The great Picton at once began a flirtation with a pretty waiting-maid in the Ostend hotel. A day or two later they were all breakfasting at Brussels when Picton was summoned by the Duke of Wellington, who was in the park "walking with Fitzroy Somerset and the Duke of Wellington." A little later Gronow, whose position was entirely anomalous, was advised to look up his own regiment. He did so, and the officers received him with shouts of "What the deuce brought you here? Why are you not with your battalion in London? Get off your horse, and explain how you came here!" But it was no time for snubbing a young man. The measured boom of artillery was heard, and the immortal British squares were forming. Napoleon's white horse could be descried through field-glasses. The whole of the British infantry lay down when the French artillery began work—three hundred guns. Gronow, fresh from London and the gambling-table, saw it all. The scenes he describes are familiar; yet this man about town writes thrilling words:

About 4 p.m. the enemy's artillery in front of us ceased firing all of a sudden, and we saw large masses of cavalry advance. Not a man present who survived could have forgotten in after life the awful grandeur of that charge. You perceived at a distance what appeared to be an overwhelming, long, moving line, which, ever advancing, glittered like a stormy wave of the sea when it catches the sunlight. On came the mounted host until they got near enough, while the very earth seemed to vibrate beneath their thundering tramp. One might suppose that nothing could have resisted the shock of this terrible moving mass. They were the famous cuirassiers, almost all old soldiers, who had distinguished themselves on most of the battle-fields of Europe. In an almost incredibly short period they were within twenty yards of us, shouting Vive l'Empereur!

No need to tell how the British bayonets received that onset; but in another part of his book Captain Gronow has a touch which startles the reader. He says: "I shall never forget the strange noise our bullets made against the breastplates of Kellermann's and Milhaud's cuirassiers. . . . I can only compare it with a somewhat homely simile, to the noise of a violent hailstorm beating upon panes of glass." How the dandy officers shone and died that day! There was the Earl of March, afterwards Duke of Richmond, who had recovered from a lung wound just in time to be at Waterloo, whence he returned to marry the most beautiful girl of the day; there was Colonel Colquitt, who picked up a live shell and flung it far; there was Chambers, who was killed by a bullet as he was in the act of receiving the sword of a French officer; there was Somerville Burges, who was a Guardsman at seventeen, and when his leg was amputated hopped on the other to the ambulance cart; there was Captain Percival of the 1st Guards, who had his jaws shot away; there was Captain Curzon, son of Lord Scarsdale, who died while Lord March was bringing him a surgeon; there was Sir William Ponsonby, who headed charge after charge, and then sank in a bog and was killed.

The distance between Bond-street and a battlefield was frequently very short in those days. In the Peninsula, especially, the gaieties of the bivouacs adumbrated the gaieties of the West End. Even Wellington kept his pack of hounds and wore the colours of the Hatfield hunt. Dandies like the Hon. W. Dawson spread wondrous banquets in the midst of war's alarms. Gronow gives us a pen picture of this most elegant warrior:

He was surrounded by muleteers, with whom he was bargaining to provide carriage for innumerable hampers of wine, liqueurs, hams, potted meat, and other good things which he had brought from England. He was a particularly gentlemanly and amiable man, much beloved by the regiment; no one was so hospitable or lived so magnificently. His cooks were the best in the army, and he, besides, had a host of servants of all nations—Spaniards, French, Portuguese, Italians—who were employed in scouring the country for provisions. Lord Wellington once honoured him with his company; and, on entering the ensign's tent, found him alone at table, with a dinner fit for a king, his plate and linen in good keeping, and his wines perfect. Lord Wellington was accompanied on this occasion by Sir Edward Pakenham and Colonel du Burgh, afterwards Lord Downes. It fell to my lot to partake of his princely hospitality, and dine with him at his quarters, a farmhouse in a village on the Bidassoa, and I never saw a better dinner put upon the table.

The keen desire of these men of dress and wealth to see white-hot war is shown by a story Gronow tells of the 10th Hussars. This regiment was officered exclusively by men belonging to the first families of Great Britain. At the battle of Orthes these officers implored their colonel (Quinton) to allow them to charge the French cavalry in hand to hand encounter. Quinton, who knew his business, refused. Whereupon all the officers of the regiment signed a round robin by which they bound themselves never again to speak to their colonel. It ended in a court of inquiry, in which the colonel was exonerated of blame, and the too ardent aristocrats were forced to exchange into other regiments. It is characteristic of those days that, after weltering through the blood of Spanish battlefields, the Guards, having entered France, were "all very anxious to taste the Bordeaux wines." It was on the way to Bordeaux, at Bayonne, that the officers of the Grenadier Guards distinguished themselves by going into action holding umbrellas over their heads. Wellington, who saw the extraordinary spectacle, was highly incensed, and sent Arthur Hill at a gallop to say: "Lord Wellington does not approve of the use of umbrellas during the enemy's firing, and will not allow 'the gentlemen's sons' [the name given by the army to the Grenadier Guards] to make themselves ridiculous in the eyes of the army." This incident lends much point to a remark that Wellington made long after, that he had always found his dandy officers the bravest of the brave. Yet a story follows which neatly distinguishes the luxury of the field from that of London. When the British forces were retiring from Burgos, Colonel Freemantle was sent by Lord Wellington to find quarters for himself and his staff. After galloping over miles of waste, the officers could find nothing but a peasant's hut. A good fire was kindled, and Freemantle hurried back to announce his luck. On his return he found that an officer had usurped the hut and was standing with his back to the fire, whistling in his contentment. He flatly refused to vacate his quarter for the Duke, or for Old Nick himself; but the threat of a court-martial brought him to his senses, and he surrendered the poor accommodation. When Freemantle told this afterwards to Beau Brummel, sitting at White's Club, that worthy replied: "Freemantle, if I had been in your place, I should have rung the bell and desired the servants to kick the fellow downstairs." Yet Gronow, a dandy no less than a soldier, can write very sympathetically of Brummel; indeed, he loves to tell us about the beaux, the gamblers, the opera-dancers, the flaneurs, and eccentrics of bygone days. His book is as much a collection of bric-à-brac as a display of war trophies. But it is just the ever-recurring boom of cannon in the midst of gaiety, and the blend of luxury and extravagance with the finest qualities of the soldier that makes Gronow's miscellany a veritable book. We could have tossed his pages into a spray of the lightest anecdote, of puns and repartees and cooking receipts and scandals and fashions of dress and equipage. Let our reproduction of one of the fine illustrations represent the best of Gronow's peace pages. Our treatment of his book has been influenced by the events of the moment, and we seal it with an anecdote. Describing the march of the British army from Torres Vedras to the Bidassoa Gronow tells us how Frank Russell, "the pride of Woburn Abbey," behaved in the battle of the Pyrenees. Of the noblest birth, and of the finest courage, Russell surpassed his own colonel in leadership, and, with the colours of the 7th Fusiliers grasped in his hand, he mounted a wall and cheered the British on. Wellington saw him there, and next day, when Russell's conduct was fully described to him, exclaimed: "Ah! there's nothing like blood."

Children's Books.—I.

ALREADY, although it is but the first week in November, and although the purpose of the children's book is to serve as a Christmas present, our shelves are loaded with this class of literature. We make a first effort this week to cope with this mass, beginning with the volume which was selected from the autumn announcements by our Prize Competitors as that which promised most interest—Mr. Andrew Lang's Red Book of Animal Stories (Longmans).

This is Mr. Lang's eleventh Christmas budget, to say nothing of his own fairy tales; and it is one of the best of an excellent series. Of the dedication—to Miss Sybil Corbet—we have spoken elsewhere, and also of the conclusion of the preface. The stories themselves are, of course, the thing. We have but one complaint against them, and that is, that Mr. Lang's own pen is not more evident. He contributes but one anecdote, which tells how one Pincher, of Scotland, believed that he saw the ghost of a dog he had vanquished. Pincher's tail went but once between his legs, and he loved sacred music. The book is a most agreeable medley. Mr. Lang misnames a classic when he speaks of "A Bad Boy's Book of Beasts"; it is "The Bad Child's Book of Beasts." The Red Book of Animal Stories has many pictures, and costs six shillings.

To the grown-up reader new translations of Hans Andersen are unpardonable. Only one version will he permit, and that is, of course, the one from which the matchless stories first came to him. For most people Mrs. Paull's edition is the one. It is not perfect: the "Metal Pig," for example, is but a poor way of describing the Bronze Boar of Florence; and yet to anyone who was brought up on Mrs. Paull there is an almost offensive affectation about calling that good creature by any more dignified name. Again, "Big Claus and Little Claus" is to the Paullian the only possible title of one of the best stories ever written: and "Great Claus and Little Claus," as Mrs. E. Lucas has it in her new edition of Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales, just published (Dent. 5s.), sounds utterly wrong. None the less, for little readers who are coming to the Danish wizard for the first time this book is excellent. The best stories are here, and the type is large.

Last Christmas a new illustrator made his appearance in the person of Mr. Percy J. Billingham, with an edition of Aesop's Fables. This year the same artist gives us A Hundred Fables of La Fontaine (Lane. 6s.), and therein repeats his success. To have the two books is perhaps to know too much of Mr. Billingham's limitations; but children are not troubled by these things. What a child likes is a book of pictures of animals, and that is what Mr. Billingham gives him. The donkey, perhaps, is a shade too prominent in the present work; but that is the fault of the fabulist, who without the ass would often have been utterly gravelled for matter. One of Mr. Billingham's best pieces of work is on p. 165; one of his worst on p. 129, where he depicts a shadow that could not possibly have been thrown by the substance in question. But, as we have said, the nursery is careless of technique, and Mr. Billingham's century of lions and monkeys, dogs and asses, rats and cats, should please it immensely.

Mrs. Edith Farmiloe's nursery book for 1899 comes into direct competition with Mr. Phil May's Gutter Snipes, save that it is coloured. Rag, Tag, and Bobtail (Richards. 6s.) is the title, and the theme thereof is the life of the poor children of London. Mrs. Farmiloe could hardly have had a subject better suited to her quaint impressionistic manner, and a very attractive little company of ragamuffins is the result. The ideal illustrator for children gives us more drama than we find here, but bright colour atones for much and there are many vivid patches in this book. Whether or not it was well for Miss Winifred Parnell, who writes accompanying verses, to drop into the vernacular of the streets, it is for parents to decide. Personally we are a little doubtful.

It is several years since Mr. Palmer Cox invented his Brownies, but their charm is still fresh and the knowledge that a new Brownie volume is ready will be received with enthusiasm. In The Brownies Abroad (Unwin. 6s.) a variant upon Brownies Around the World is offered. We see them at Waterloo, at Killarney, on Vesuvius, at the Zoo, at Flodden Field, and at sea. To what extent the descriptive verses are read we do not know, but they strike the critic as being rather stodgy. The pictures are probably the real attraction, and they remain as clever and spirited as ever. The pleasure of identifying Mr. Cox's types never palls.

Not since Mr. Linley Sambourne illustrated Water Babies have more winsome naked cherubs been seen than those in Fairies, Elves, and Flower Babies (Duckworth. 3s. 6d.), by Miss Wallace-Dunlop. It is a book of charming fancies exquisitely translated into line by an accomplished pencil. A pleasant narrative has been written round the pictures by Mrs. Rivett-Carnac. Another interesting illustrated book is Pictures from Bird Land (Dent. 5s. net), by M. and E. Detmold. M. and E. Detmold are the twin brothers, now aged fifteen, of whose artistic precocity people have talked in studios for some years past, and certainly their draughtmanship and sense of colour are very extraordinary. The brothers seem to be equally gifted. In this volume they present some two dozen birds, familiar and unfamiliar, decoratively rather than realistically treated. The colouring is both sombre and rich, and is very restful and satisfying. If children appreciate it less than their parents do, no one need mind. Another new picture-book with some novelty is The Sculptor Caught Napping (Dent. 2s. 6d.), a collection of nursery rhymes illustrated in silhouette and in inverted silhouette, or white on black, by Jane E. Cook. There is a freshness about this method, although it is partially a return to an old one, that should commend it to children.

Other New Books.

THE CLIMBS OF NORMAN-NERUDA.

EDITED BY MAY NORMAN-NERUDA.

This book is the fitting epitaph—for the most part written by himself—of a hardy climber who, it will be remembered, met his death last autumn in the full vigour of early manhood, on a mountain he may be said to have made his own. Mr. Norman-Neruda was fortunate in having a wife who shared all his enthusiasm and a large part of his achievements. She was with him on his last fatal climb, and in the first chapter of her book gives a pathetic account of the accident which closed his career. The other chapters are from her husband's hand, and deal with some of his most notable ascents—chiefly in the Dolomites—and with such general matters as "The Alps out of Season," "Mountaineering without Guides," and "The Technical Difficulties of Rock-Climbing." Much of the book has already appeared in print—in the Alpine Journal and elsewhere; the rest has been taken from "journals and note-books without any pretence at literary form." No doubt Mr. Neruda—as he himself says—was "far more at home with the wielding of an ice-axe than with the use of the pen," and yet his more technical chapters will supply valuable material for some future history of mountaineering, while the less technical passages are at times vivid and enthralling. There is an account, for instance, of a night adventure with Mrs. Neruda on the Cimon della Pala that almost recalls another hand. What Travels Robert Louis Stevenson might have given us if only the Cevennes had inspired him to try ice and snow. Besides being a dauntless climber, Mr. Neruda had a keen æsthetic sense, and seems seldom to have come down from his mountains without a goodly store of notes on sun and cloud and other atmospheric effects.

With one exception, the illustrations are poor. And the exception, far from excusing the others, does but condemn them, for it is drawn from a similar source, and owes its superiority entirely to a superior process. If one half of the whole had been sacrificed, and the other half treated like Signor Vittorio Sella's Antelao, the book, dealing as it does with a comparatively unfamiliar district, would have been even more acceptable. There are misprints not a few in this otherwise well-printed book, including the persistent spelling of "Oesterreich"—except in the Introduction—with an initial C.

SOLDIERS OF THE QUEEN.

BY HORACE WYNDHAM.

We found much excellence in Mr. Wyndham's book The Queen's Service. In this volume we have the same sort of information about the British soldier's life, conveyed in a more dramatic form. In a series of sketches we are introduced to the Recruiting Department, the Barracks, the Canteen, the Sergeants' Ball, Kit Inspection, the Draft for India, and many other features of Tommy Atkins's varied lot. We have a spirited account of the réveille and the hasty and exiguous ablutions which follow under the eye of the drill-sergeant:

Time presses, and consequently toilets have to be hurriedly performed. The man who objects to making use of the same muddy liquid that has done duty for less than three others is deemed unduly fastidious.

"Now then," sharply exclaims an impatient warrior to a recruit who is endeavouring to procure a fresh supply of water, "don't make a meal of it—this ain't no perishin' swimmin'-bath, you know. Just buck up, and let someone else have a go at the basin if it ain't good enough for you!"

Thus adjured, the bowl is quickly surrendered to a less critically-minded comrade. Plunging his head into the strange composition before him, the new arrival quickly withdraws it, and then hastily rushes back to his barrack-room.

Then comes the parade before breakfast. The drill-corporal is desirous to "shake the beggars up," and this is how he does it:

"Now then, Number Seven," he continues, "we'll make another start—that is, if you've quite finished feelin' if your back hair happens to be on straight this morning. It's you I'm talking to—third man from the left of the front rank. I haven't the pleasure of knowin' your name, but I expect to be writin' it down for an hour's extra duty, pretty soon. Now then—look to your front—squad, 'tchun! left, dress! Turn your eyes to the left—without squinting like Chinese dummies—if you can. Stand up in the ranks, too, like soldiers; not like a measley row of lop-sided, spindle-shanked, Cockney shop-boys! Stick your chests out, and put your stummicks somewhere out of sight altogether. There's 'arf of you with figures like bags of potatoes. Strike me crimson if I ever saw such a mob! Hi! you in the centre—the ginger-headed man, I mean—don't grin like that—this ain't no perishin' beauty competition—not by no manner of means."

This is the roughest side of the life of a well-behaved private in barracks. Mr. Wyndham's pages are full of pleasant things and amusing stories. He tells, for instance, how a certain army chaplain liked to see his soldier congregation behave with as much military precision in church as on parade. He was not satisfied with the way the choir turned to the east at the beginning of the Creed, so he went to the sergeant-major for advice. The sergeant-major said he would assist him, and accompanied him to the chapel, where a choir practice was being conducted. Here he surveyed the choir with a professional eye, and harangued them as follows: "Choir—'shon! When the reverend gent starts on 'Hi believe'—stand steady! Remember, these words is merely a caution. When he gets on to 'Gord-the-Father,' however, I want to see you draw back the toe of the right foot, place it against the 'ollow of the left 'eel, and turn smartly round in the required direction. Now then—one, two, three—Steady!" An admirable little book for soldiers, ex-soldiers, and would-be soldiers. (Sands & Co.)

A SPLICED YARN.

BY GEORGE CUPPLES.

This is a book of the sea—call it novel, narrative, or sketch. Mr. Cupples's story The Green Hand was an admirable sea-yarn, and in these "Strands from the Life Cable of Bill Bullen," to quote the sub-title, we have some delightful writing. Bill has returned from his last voyage, and is yarning to his friends. He tells how the old frigate came tumbling home, and how he took his farewell of the sea:

When we were paid off at Spithead, an' I'd got my traps ashore at Plymouth-point, I turns in to snooze out the three watches for once; but three shipmates hauled me out at eight bells of the middle watch, to drink success to the cruise on shore. So the first thing next day, I hired a donkey, and went over to the Reach, in sight of Spithead and the sea, just to give the old brine-tub a parting hail. The spring-tide was coming in full, and a seventy-four and a frigate standing out under all sail, an' everything looked so brisk and fresh in the offing, while the beach behind and the town was so dirty-like and smoky, that a sort of terror came over me at the idee of being wiled out once more. So I gave a long look at the craft and the sea-line, an', thinks I, it doesn't signify, old salt-and-blue, here I am out of your law; mother 'arth shall have my bones yet, an' not need a shot to sink them. It's my last sight of blue water; I'll never more hear the ripple alongside in the hammock, nor hand canvas on a yard. I own it seemed melancholy-like, as if I'd remembered every messmate and shipmate I ever sailed with. The tide had almost floated the beast off ground as he stood, and, when we wore round to make the port again, I could ha' fancied the sea was coming after me, hand-over-hand, it broke with such a splash under the creature's counter. There it was, too, looking through the end of every street in the town, like some great eye watching you; an' I didn't feel easy in my mind till the coach I got aboard of dropped it under the hills, and we bearing right away into the green land.

That is good. And right well does little Bill draw the old man's portrait:

I never knew a man who loved the sea from the bottom of his heart, with all its hardships and stirring perils, as he did; the whole story about his being wearied and longing for the land was, I fancy, a sudden whim he took into his head after a three years' cruise. In a few months he got restless, knocked off his little jobs, and, between his long spells at the pipe, the only thing which seemed to give him any satisfaction was telling stories about the sea to everyone whom he could get hold of, doing anything which could remind him of it, or reading books of old voyages. He and I built a whole fleet of ships of every rig, from a frigate to a cutter, over at the carpenter's; which we floated on the pond when we had cleared it of ducks; and in six months' time I knew every rope, sail, and evolution, almost as well as I do now, and could box the compass like a pilot's boy.

The book is capitably illustrated by Mr. Frank Brangwyn, and it is one to keep as well as to read. (Gibbings & Co. 5s.)

THE SIEGE OF TROY.

BY C. H. A. WAGER, PH.D.

This is a study in the roman of Troy which the Middle Ages based, not upon Homer, but upon the late Latin writers, Dares Phrygius and Dictys Cretensis. The particular text edited by Prof. Wager is that of a fourteenth century version of no great merit. It has, moreover, been previously printed, and the MS. here used is not the best of the three in existence. But it gives Prof. Wager opportunity for a careful and useful summary of the cycle as a whole, and the importance in it of the Roman de Troie of Benoît de Sainte-More. The subject is not negligible by students of English literature, because from Benoît and the rest are derived, in part directly, in part through the medium of Boccaccio's Filistrato, both the Troilus and Criseyde of Chaucer, and the Troilus and Cressida of Shakespeare. (Macmillan.)

Fiction.

Daniel Whyte. By A. J. Dawson.
(Methuen & Co. 6s.)

In a somewhat ornamental and self-conscious dedication Mr. Dawson says this book "is the best thing I have made." It is. It is a very good book. We regard it as that one book which, as someone said, every man has it in him to write. We do not mean that Mr. Dawson will not write another book as good or better. But this is his book. He calls it a biography; no doubt much of it is autobiography. The life of Daniel Whyte as an apprentice on the sailing-ship Glenrae, and many of his subsequent adventures in Australia, must surely have been experienced by Mr. Dawson in person. Despite literary affectations, he can write:

He learned how fine a thing it was to pace at midnight the poop of a four-masted ship under full sail, flying before a steady gale on her quarter, her lee rail no more than a foot above the foam, her water-ways running, her back-stays singing a fierce chant, and her sheets so near to sundering that they could hold no moisture in their many-plaited white strands. Wheel full and bye, and weather leeches throbbing strongly, like the little muscles in a wrestler's loins; every other inch of the sail's acres strained to the immovable hither side of bursting point.

A faint panting shudder thrills the ship, ten ton of green water roars over her weather-bow and races aft and leeward, fighting past scupper-holes; the man at the wheel, teeth on lip, gains half a spoke more in his mastery of the grinding rudder. "Steadee, as she goes!" murmurs the second mate beside him; and the great ship's smooth stride goes on as before, like a horse taking fallen trees in his gallop.

The latter part of the book, dealing with Daniel's sentimental experiences, is the least satisfactory, though his first wife—the amiable, silly, superstitious little Margy—is drawn with direct and convincing skill. It is Mrs. Denton, the femme de trente ans, the guardian angel, the sister of mercy, the marvel of insight, delicacy, and love, in whom we cannot believe; she is exquisite but incredible, and at bottom she is merely a very old convention highly elaborated.

But, on the whole, Daniel Whyte is a work of which Mr. Dawson, always strenuous and eager, may be proud. We have referred to his literary affectations, and they must not be passed over in silence. Why does he in various ways imitate Mr. Kipling? In verse headings to chapters, for example? His verses are the merest echo, and not in the least illuminative to the story. Mr. Kipling is frequently in the mind of Mr. Dawson, to the great discomfort of the reader. Passages like the following are an irritation:

Now a man does not voluntarily expose himself, nor to his dearest comrade, his mistress, or his wife. Wherefore, when circumstances and a man's state of mind do so combine as to strip him, it is not good that his nakedness should be made public. But its out-working, the upshot of it, in this case belongs to the story of Daniel Whyte. That is why it is shown in this place.

Lastly, Mr. Dawson is addicted to annoying eccentricities of phrase: among these are "adown," "wot of," "on a day," "because that," "put a period upon" (for "put an end to"). He writes at the conclusion of his novel the word "Selah." It is time that Mr. Dawson put away childish things, especially as he is, with emphasis, a man.

A Lost Lady of Old Years. By John Buchan.
(John Lane.)

WE must say at once that this book has many merits. Mr. Buchan writes with a keen appreciation of the value of words; he has a style which is vigorous and invigorating, if a thought too imitative of a greater romancist; and a descriptive power which casts around us the atmosphere—or what we suppose was the atmosphere—of Scotland during the '45 Rebellion. But it is the business of the story-writer to tell a story; and here Mr. Buchan breaks down. His plot, when it is not vague, is inadequate. It is not enough that Mr. Francis Birkenshaw should ride perilously through the Highlands, tumble down precipices, talk on matters of high politics with Lord Lovat, and stand beside that shifty nobleman on Tower Hill; we must know why he did all this, and sympathise with his motive. He does it for the sake of Mrs. Murray, the beautiful wife of Secretary Murray, concerning whose reputation tongues wagged not without reason. Now, until the book is nearing its end we get only a glimpse or two of the lady, and—it is entirely the fault of the author—we do not care two straws about Mrs. Murray. We only wonder at her amazing folly in sending on a delicate and important political mission a young stranger whom she had caught in a mean act and slashed across the face with her riding-whip. Resting on so feeble a foundation, the story is naturally ill-built and ill-balanced. But a story, unlike an egg, may be good in parts. Mr. Buchan gives a quite unforgettable sketch of the rush and turmoil in the narrow streets and the taverns of Edinburgh during the Jacobite rising, and his portrait of Lord Lovat, the vain, shifty, clever, treacherous old nobleman who yet made so good an end on the scaffold, is excellent. On the evening before his execution Francis Birkenshaw finds him carousing with his kin in a chamber of the Tower, "making as merry as if it were an ale-house in Inverness."

Then he fell into a long strain of moralising after his fashion, but the near approach of death gave a flavour to his words which exalted them almost to wisdom. "See, Mr. Birkenshaw," he said simply, "ye are a young man and may take a word of counsel. I have, maybe, made a hash of my life, for I was ower wild and headstrong, and maybe ower given to the sins of the flesh. But after all I have had my sport out o' life. I have had my fingers in every pie that's been making, and, faith, I have created some sort of a steer in the world. And that would ever be my counsel to young blood—to gang forrit, set the world in a bleeze if ye can, and if ye get your hair singit as I've got mine, ye need never care for the sake of the grand spectacle."

He took out his watch and considered. "Twelve hours more in this middenstead of a world," he said, speaking loud to all. "Now mind ye, Shamus Fraser," and he turned to one of his friends, "Ye hear the last injunction of your chief. Ye will have my body buried in the Kirk of Kirk-hill, for there lie all the generations of Lovat, and I've put a note in my will by which I leave bountith to all the pipers frae John o' Groats to Edinburgh to play before my body. Lord, it will be a braw music, and I wish I could be there to hear it. But it's like that the Government will not allow it," he said sadly.

Finally, we would counsel Mr. Buchan, when he is planning out his next novel, to give more pains to the planning and setting of his underlying motives. This is not perhaps the most difficult part of the story-teller's task; but it is a necessary one. It is a pity to build a fair structure on an insecure foundation.

We speak of Mr. Buchan's next novel; but we hope that he will be in no haste to produce it. Mr. Buchan (it is written in Who's Who) was born in 1875. He has written history, poetry, criticism, and fiction. Yet a young author must assimilate life as well as portray it. It would be a good rule for young writers not to produce a creative work oftener than once in three years.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

ACTIVE SERVICE.

BY STEPHEN CRANE.

This is a novel with the Turco-Greek war for its pivot. Mr. Crane has already dealt with that campaign, which he witnessed as a special correspondent, in his fine story "Death and the Child." He has here more room to work in. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE SPLENDID PORSENNA.

BY MRS. HUGH FRASER.

Mrs. Hugh Fraser has travelled much, and her pen turns from books of travel to travel-fiction with ease. Here we are in Rome among Italian and English characters. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE WATCHERS.

BY A. E. W. MASON.

A new story by the author of Miranda of the Falcony, in Arrowsmith's Bristol Library, which began with Called Back. It opens at the south end of Burleigh-street, Strand, on July 15, 1758. Thereafter is mystery and romance, such as Mr. Mason knows well how to compound. (Arrowsmith. 1s.)

SOME EXPERIENCES OF AN IRISH R.M.BY E. CE. SOMERVILLE AND MARTIN ROSS.

These stories, by the joint authors of that clever story, The Silver Fox, are racy and well-written pictures of Irish life as seen by a resident magistrate. Sport and horse-dealing receive their full share of attention. (Longmans, Green & Co. 6s.)

CALLED BACK TO TSAR-LAND.

BY FRED. WHISHAW.

Tsar-land, of course, is Russia, a country which Mr. Whishaw explores often in his fiction. "I was, I remember, playing in a cricket match at Lord's when the telegram arrived—the telegram which came near transforming my existence, and which was, indeed, the raison d'être of the narrative now about to be made public." This narrative is the usual thing—politics, strategy, plot, counter-plot, and Borofsky. (Jarrold. 6s.)

SWORD AND ASSEGAI.

BY ANNA HOWARTH.

In the preface, dated Cape Colony, August, 1899, we are told that almost every incident in this book is true, down to the smallest details. The title, perhaps, gives too sanguinary a notion of the work, which is descriptive of Cape life in peace as well as in unrest. Jan: an Afrikaner, by the same author, will be remembered. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

A MAN ADRIFT.

BY BART KENNEDY.

The rough-and-ready, unvarnished, straightforward, narrative of a rover about the world, living from hand to mouth, getting down on his luck, running strange risks, meeting picturesque wastrels. "They talk of the cloven hoof of wickedness, but I tell you it is as nothing compared with the iron heel of organised charity." (Greening. 6s.)

THE DON AND THE UNDERGRADUATE.

BY W. E. W. COLLINS.

A pleasant love-story, flavoured with the usual Oxford ingredients. (Blackwood. 6s.)

CHARMING MISS KYRLE.

BY MINA SANDEMAN.

Miss Kyrle and her widow mother are both young, and they advise each other about their love affairs. How typical of a vast class of novels is a passage like this: "I ought to be thoroughly ashamed of myself, but the imp of mischief was at my heels, prodding me on to play you a trick, dear Lady Kyrle! I came up softly behind you on the grass—I confess it was exceedingly 'low form.' The worthy Straker told me I should find you in the grounds, and I was shrewd enough to guess the direction in which you had wended your steps. I am aware of your partiality to the setting sun." Thus spake man to woman never. And yet this is a readable society novel. (John Long. 6s.)

A PASSING FANCY.

BY MRS. LOVETT CAMERON.

Another widow heroine. "The love of power is the rock upon which hundreds of women make shipwreck of their lives." Two such shipwrecks are accounted for in this story, which deals with an antagonism between a widow and a young girl in the contest for a man's love. Our sympathies are with the widow. A distinctly readable story. (John Long. 6s.)

BEYOND THESE DREAMS.

BY G. BERESFORD FITZGERALD.

A third widow! Old Weller's advice to Sam is thrown away on novelists this week. The Baroness Steinitz is the rather indigent widow of a millionaire, whose will had proved disappointing. The Baroness is only twenty-six, and handsome. Her fortunes and those of her daughter Sara make the story, which contains some smartly-drawn pictures of village society. (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

AN OBSCURE APOSTLE.

BY MME. ORZESZKO.

A translation, by C. S. de Soissons, of a novel by the Polish Georges Sand. "Eliza Orzeszko," said Henryk Sienkiewicz, "still holds the sceptre as a novelist." This story, which has the passionate seriousness and length common to Polish fiction, deals with Polish Jewry. (Greening. 6s.)

THE WHITE QUEEN.

BY RUSSELL GARNIER.

Another story of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, the hero of When Knighthood was in Flower. The tale opens in 1514, and the White Queen is Mary Tudor. (Harper. 6s.)

ROXANE.

BY LOUIS CRESWICKE.

A busy romance of East and West. "Seatoun hurried off, hired a caique, and was rowed alongside the Sea Star in time to find Geoffrey Wykeham in the act of returning from his dinner at the Embassy." Politics and love blend in the book, which has the saddest of endings. (Cassell. 6s.)

MRS. DUNBAR'S SECRET.

BY ALAN ST. AUBYN.

Mr. St. Aubyn's fourteenth novel deals with family troubles and mysteries, through which we see Mrs Dunbar and her lovely daughter rise from poverty to affluence. The Times' Agony Column sets things in motion, and the reader's interest is held. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

MR. BOYTON.

BY W. D. HAYES.

Mr. Boyton agonises the world by making a corner in pork. His pig-fortresses in Chicago are stormed by the people, who fall when they touch the walls, every inch of which is a death-dealing electric battery. With his profits Mr. Boyton buys Poland, and fights the armies of Germany with electric volts. Some people like this sort of thing. (Simpkin, Marshall.)

THE GOLDEN DAY.

BY WILLIAM KIRBY.

A very long romance of Canada at the time of the decline of French power and the capture of Quebec by the English. The author has spared no pains, and his local colour and historical detail are good. (Jarrold. 6s.)

Ivan Turgenev.

An Enquiry.

I.

THE approaching completion of an English version, in fifteen volumes, of the "Works" of Ivan Turgenev, translated by Mrs. Constance Garnett, introduced by Mr. Edward Garnett, and published by Mr. William Heinemann, deserves more than that passing and perfunctory notice which is usually accorded to such achievements. The decade now drawing to a close has been rather remarkable for newly translated and worthily produced editions of great foreign novelists. We have had Dumas, Balzac, Victor Hugo, Björnson, and d'Annunzio. And we have had Turgenev. But the case of the author of Virgin Soil differs from the rest. Dumas, Balzac, Hugo—these are names which have a very definite meaning to the public. Björnson, too, is renowned among us, and already the youthful d'Annunzio has raised a general curiosity. Translations of any of these men could be sure in advance of at least a moderate acceptance; in some instances the acceptance has amounted to enthusiasm. The late Sergius Stepniak, in his introduction to the English translation of Smoke (1894), said that Turgenev, "during the last fifteen years of his life, won for himself the reading public, first in France, then in Germany and America, and finally in England." The statement is certainly not correct as regards England and America, and it is only true in a very limited sense of France and Germany. Except in Russia, Turgenev has not even to-day captured the "reading public." He has everywhere captured the men of letters; but these constitute only a fraction of "the reading public." Men of letters who happen to have genius do not write for men of letters. They write, as Wagner was proud to say he composed, for the ordinary person. From the Russian magazines Turgenev used to receive £24 a "leaf" for serial rights. Stevenson never got as much, and Mr. Kipling has not greatly surpassed the figure. When genius commands such a price, it is fame; it is to "capture the reading public." Compare this vogue with the condition of affairs in England, and in France, the ultimate home of Turgenev's adoption. It is extremely improbable that any of his novels has reached a sale of ten thousand copies even in France. As for England, I do not hesitate to say that half-a-dozen years ago Turgenev was barely a name to our "reading public." It was Tolstoi who had made the capture. The more honour, and a very special esteem, therefore, to Mrs. Garnett and her colleagues in this undertaking of an approximately complete Turgenev in English. They have worthily laboured, they have courageously accepted risks, with a single eye to the cause of art. And, whatever the immediate result, they are to be vehemently congratulated upon their work. The format is admirable; considering the price, it is wonderful. Mr. Garnett's introductory essays contain much subtle and just appreciation. A complete ignorance of the Russian language prevents me from measuring the excellence of the translation. But decidedly it has the air of being faithful; it is good English, and quite apart and aloof from the ruck of translations. Stepniak, who should be an authority, said it was "as near an approach to the elegance and poetry of the original" as any he had encountered. Certainly, the same scholarship and the same enormous pains have not before been brought to an English rendering of Turgenev. It would be unfair to match it with the French translation, in fourteen volumes, published by Hetzel, Charpentier, and Hachette. The most eminent of his contemporaries were glad to help Turgenev in that translation; parts of it he did with his own hand, and every volume had the incomparable advantage of his minute revision. No other novelist was ever translated with such literary pomp. But, circumstance for circumstance, our English edition will hold its own. We have the right to boast of it. Possibly, as volume of it succeeded volume, with but scant expression of gratitude from either Press or public, those who had it in hand may have been a little discouraged and set back. They may have imagined that their efforts were thankless; in part wasted. Not so. What they have done they have done; and it was always good in the sight of the few whose unspoken applause is above the sound of trumpets.

IVAN TURGENEV.

II.

Any attempt to examine the relations between Turgenev and his Western publics must suffer at its very inception by the fact that in neither French nor English is there a proper biography of the man; a full account of his life, his opinions, and his methods. The Vicomte E. M. de Vogüé's essay prefixed to the Œuvres Dernières is masterly, but it is only an essay. Renan's funeral oration, included in the same volume, is a majestic and lovely tribute, but it is only a discourse. For the rest, there are Deligne's Tourgueneff Inconnu, fragmentary and mediocre; Pavlonsky's Souvenirs sur Tourgueneff, said to be very unreliable; the volume of letters, useful as far as it goes, edited by Halperine-Kaminsky under the title Tourgueneff and his French Circle; and critical studies by Paul Bourget and Ernest Dupuy. Strangely enough, Turgenev's own Souvenirs Littéraires are not obtainable in French. At some future date Mrs. Garnett might well crown her work by adding to it a translation of these Souvenirs. Such extracts therefrom as may be found here and there are of the highest interest and value.

The most important event in Turgenev's career was, of course, his self-exile from Russia. He was born in 1818. Russia is a place of sorrow for artists and thinkers to-day; it was more sorrowful then. You will get many glimpses of it in A Sportsman's Sketches, First Love, and other tales. If his mother had been sympathetic, it is conceivable that he might have stayed at home. But Turgenev's mother is already notorious. The Vicomte de Vogüé points out that in Turgenev's novels all the mothers are either wicked or grotesque. We learn from the Journal of Mme. Turgenev's adopted daughter that when Ivan took home his first book—Parasha (1841)—“the tiny blue-covered volume lay about mamma's room; it was never mentioned.” A little incident touching this adopted daughter shows at once what manner of woman Mme. Turgenev was, and what the times were. The girl had fallen ill, and a serf-physician was ordered to attend her. “Remember,” said the terrible mistress, “if you don't cure her—Siberia.” Then there was the mighty censor, whose antics, performed apparently out of pure love of the ridiculous, are almost incredible. Turgenev wrote: “The young girl was a flower.” In the interests of law and order, the censor altered this to: “The young lady resembled a splendid rose.” One can sympathise with an author's desire to put a thousand miles between himself and the mere physical presence of that official. But indeed authors have never been recognised of the powers in Russia. Turgenev told Edmond de Goncourt that at a dinner given by Count Orloff to celebrate the emancipation of the serfs, he was placed forty-seventh, after the despised priest. To catch the full beauty of this anecdote it is necessary to remember that Turgenev was then of European renown; that he was an intimate friend of the host, and that his books had helped to bring about the emancipation. It was from such a land that Turgenev fled. He explains the flight thus:

For myself, I can say that I felt very keenly the disadvantages of this wrenching-away from my native soil, of this violent rupture of all the bonds which held me to the land of my youth; but there was nothing else to be done. That existence, that environment, and in particular that sphere to which I belonged—the sphere of country landowners and of serfdom—offered me no inducement to stay. On the contrary, nearly everything I saw around me awoke in me a feeling of disquiet, of revolt—to be frank, of disgust. I could not hesitate long. Either I must wholly submit, and follow the common groove, the beaten path, or I must deracinate myself at a single stroke, and get away from everyone and everything, even at the risk of losing many things dear to my heart. I chose the latter course. I plunged head first into the “German Ocean”; it purified and regenerated me; and when at length I emerged from its waters, I found myself an Occidental, and an Occidental I have always remained.

(“Voilà le gros mot lâché,” comments de Vogüé—“Occidental.”)

It seems convincing—yet I am conscious of a desire to cry for more light upon the temperamental causes of Turgenev's exile. Other great Russian authors suffered infinitely more than he; but they stayed. And they stayed because, in spite of all, Russia was still Russia to them. Did Turgenev unconsciously anticipate Ibsen, and was it the artist in him demanding equanimity in order to create that drove him out of his own country? Or was his departure due simply to a revolt of outraged sentiments? In the latter case our estimate of the man would be somewhat lowered. Whatever the truth of the matter, it appears to me quite possible that the disadvantages of his exile outweighed the advantages. This voluntary banishment certainly intensified that pervading melancholy and that inflexible reserve which have operated against the popularity of his novels among Western readers. To some extent it even interfered with his productiveness. Of Paris he once said: “It is impossible for me to work here.” During the whole of his maturity he was a wanderer, without a hearth. He led a life of restaurants. He had acquaintances with whom he was on very familiar terms, and who liked and admired him immensely—the Viardots, Flaubert, de Goncourt, Daudet, and doubtless others in Germany and England—but had this pseudo-Occidental a single veritable friend outside Russia? Did he ever, in spite of his marvellous conversational powers, so freely exercised, ever fully reveal himself to his “French circle”? For myself, I suspect not. He was lonely, this man to whom all the most exalted doors in western Europe were open. He continually regretted his original sacrifice. For ever haunted by obscure racial longings, he retired within himself and became a mystery. As with many talkative men, his secret thoughts were his own.

What, other than Russia, were the things that lay next his heart? There was sport, we know. At the age of fifty-five he speaks, in a letter to Flaubert, of “my boundless passion for sport, the only pleasure which is left to me.” He had made a definite appointment to meet Flaubert at Croisset; but “a very pleasant fellow, called Bullock” (who “possessed the finest partridge shooting in the whole of England”), had invited him to go and “kill mountains of partridges”; and though he would probably not be able to accept the invitation, there was a possibility of his doing so; therefore Flaubert must kindly postpone the appointment, on the chance. “There is something shocking,” he observes, “in an old greybeard like myself crossing the sea twice in order to pour a lot of lead into a lot of partridges.” As a sportsman Turgenev certainly had the large grandiose manner of Dumas père. He must have been the sort of sportsman to whom keepers, so prone to scoff, pay the homage of their sincere respect. He resembled Dumas, too, though one might easily not have suspected it, on another point: an intense predilection for the feminine. This man who was never married remarked at Flaubert's dinner-table, when Flaubert and de Goncourt were contesting the importance of love to an author, that his existence was “saturated with femininity”:

With me, neither books nor anything whatever in the world could take the place of woman. How can I make that plain to you? I find it is only love which produces a certain expansion of the being, that nothing else gives . . . eh? Listen! When quite a young man I once had a mistress, a miller's girl in the neighbourhood of St. Petersburg, whom I used to see when out hunting. She was charming, very fair, with a flash of the eye rather common among us. She would accept nothing from me. But one day she said to me: “You must give me a present.”

“What is it you want?”

“Bring me some scented soap from St. Petersburg.”

I brought her the soap. She took it, disappeared, came back blushing, and murmured, offering me her hands, delicately scented:

“Kiss my hands—like you kiss the hands of ladies in drawing rooms at St. Petersburg.”

I threw myself on my knees—and, you know, that was the finest moment of my life.

We owe this histoire to the de Goncourt Journal, which from 1872 to 1883 is full of references to Turgenev. Some of the best things in that famous but untranslatable collection of curios were gathered from Turgenev. But even the all-embracing Journal, to which nothing came amiss, is silent or nearly so on the supreme question: Turgenev's methods of work and the origin and growth of that consummate skill which places him in one respect above all other novelists. Guns and women: he would discuss these. What of writing, and those intimate details about actual pen-work which, as in the case of Stevenson, must always fascinate the admirers of a great literary artist? In eleven years Turgenev seems to have mentioned this matter to de Goncourt only once. Here is the passage:

“In order to work I must have winter, a frost such as we have in Russia, an astringent cold, the trees all covered with crystals, then. . . . But I work still better in autumn, you know; on days when there is no wind, no wind at all, and the ground is elastic and the air has a taste of wine. My place—it is a little wooden house with a garden full of yellow acacias—we have no white acacia. In the autumn the earth is covered with pods, which crackle when you tread on them, and the air is filled with mocking-birds . . . yes, shrikes. In there, all alone. . . .”

Turgeneff did not finish, but a contraction of the hands closed over his chest told us of the joy and intoxication of the brain which he experienced in that little corner of old Russia.

There is not much substance in this. A solitary passage in Pavlonsky's Souvenirs is rather better:

I have various plans in my head [said Turgenev], but I can do nothing; and the saddest part of it is that work is no longer a joy to me. Once I liked to work as one likes to caress a woman. I experienced a veritable pleasure in dreaming over a work or correcting it. When I was writing I wanted no society. I isolated myself on my estates. There I had a little room in the outbuildings, something like a peasant's cabin, furnished only with a deal table and a chair; and there I used to work fairly well for months at a time. Often I would carry on literary make-believes with great zest. When I was writing Fathers and Children I kept Bazarov's diary. If I read a new book, if I met an interesting man, if there occurred any important political or social event, I always described the thing in the diary from Bazarov's point of view. The result was a large and very curious volume. Unfortunately, I have lost it. Someone borrowed it to read and never returned it.

This is interesting, but it is like a crumb to the ravenous. The man must inevitably have had a passion for technique and all the thousand and one niceties of form. He must have spent years in the sedulous cultivation of the craftsman in himself. The author of a miracle like On the Eve may be born, but he is also made. In the matter of condensation alone Turgenev was unique among the great literary artificers. He could say more in a chapter of two thousand words than any other novelist that ever lived. What he accomplishes again and again in a book of sixty thousand words, Tolstoi could not have accomplished under a quarter of a million. His genius for choosing the essential and discarding everything else, was simply unparalleled. What Ibsen did for European drama, Turgenev did for European fiction: he uttered the last word of pure artistry. And it is precisely of his life as a practical working novelist that we know nothing, or next to nothing.

Our information about his literary opinions is scarcely less meagre, and may be set out in a few lines. It is strange that Turgenev, whose work marks him as a hater of exaggeration in any form, was an enthusiastic admirer of Dickens. He put Dickens above Balzac, and was never tired in his praise. He did not care for the author of Eugénie Grandet. “Balzac,” he is stated to have remarked, “is an ethnographer, not an artist.” It is absurd, but there is criticism in it. Turgenev's reported adverse dicta about his contemporaries—Flaubert, Daudet, de Goncourt—are probably in the main apocryphal. That his critical ideals remained fluid to the end is proved by his appreciation of de Maupassant. La Maison Tellier enchanted him. Among his own books he preferred First Love, of which he said his father was the hero. He considered that A Sportsman's Sketches, with certain exceptions, showed him at his weakest. There is a diversity of view as to the order of excellence in his novels. Mr. Edward Garnett would possibly put On the Eve first, and I could not disagree with him. The Vicomte de Vogüé unhesitatingly gives the palm to A House of Gentlefolk. Certainly the epilogue to that book and the love scene in Chapter XXXIV. are unforgettable art. Yet, when I reflect upon the mass of Turgenev's work, not these, but the sketch entitled “Byezhin Prairie,” in A Sportsman's Sketches, stands out most prominent. The picture of the pony-boys by their watch-fire discussing ghosts—their artless talk, the effect and mystery of night, the ultimate dawn and sunrise . . . . when a thing is supreme there is nothing to be said.

III.

It seems to me that there are three reasons why Turgenev, despite the unaffected and zealous support everywhere extended to him by men of letters, should have failed to grip the public as Tolstoi and even Dostoevsky have gripped it. The first is, that as an artist he has hardly a fault; in particular, he never showed the least inclination to either flamboyance or vulgarity. He was always restrained and refined. Now the public may, and generally does, admire a great artist. But it begins (and sometimes ends) by admiring him for the wrong things. Shakespeare is more highly regarded for his philosophy than for his poetry, as the applause at any performance of “Hamlet” will prove. Balzac conquers by that untamed exuberance and those crude effects of melodrama which are the least valuable parts of him. And it is natural that people who concern themselves with art only in their leisure moments, demanding from it nothing but a temporary distraction, should prefer the obvious to the recondite, and should walk regardless of beauty unless it forces itself upon their attention by means of exaggerations and advertisement. The public wants to be struck, hit squarely in the face; then it will take notice. Most of the great artists, by chance or design, have performed that feat. But Turgenev happens not to have done so. Look through all his work, and I doubt if you will find a scene which in the theatrical sense could be called “powerful.” There is no appeal by force to the soul; no straining, no grandiloquence, no distortion; nothing but the flawless chastity of perfect art. His best books are like an antique statue, and their beauty, instead of delivering a blow, steals towards you and mildly penetrates the frame. As well expect the public to admire the Venus de Milo as to admire On the Eve. Refinement is mistaken for coldness, and restraint for mediocrity. And so it will ever be.

Yet Turgenev, it may be said, is popular in Russia—why not also in the West? This brings me to the second point. A work of art will sometimes triumph for reasons neither artistic nor inartistic, but by means of the moral ideas upon which it happens to be founded. Every work of art must have a moral basis, and Turgenev's novels have a moral basis beyond the ordinary. They are the muffled but supreme utterance of a nation's secret desire. But what is that to the West? The West cannot feel what Russia feels—cannot even intellectually comprehend the profound surge of emotion which barely agitates the surface of that giant's life. It is nothing to the West, for instance, that “the chief figure of On the Eve, Elena, foreshadows and stands for the rise of young Russia in the sixties”; but it is everything to Russia, with her ears sensitive to catch the least echo of her own scarce-whispered aspirations. The proportion of readers who appreciate the artistic significance of Turgenev is as small in Russia as in France and England; but every literate east of the Baltic can, and does, grasp his moral significance. Here lies the difference between Turgenev and Tolstoi. Apart from his fiery vehemence, which compels attention, Tolstoi has the advantage over Turgenev in the race for popularity, because the moral basis of his work is less exclusively Russian, and nearer the universal. The inner meaning of Anna Karenina is plain to every country. The lessons of War and Peace need no searching. The Kreutzer Sonata would apply itself as well to Salt Lake City as to Moscow. Tolstoi speaks to humanity, Turgenev to Russia. But for all that Tolstoi is the lesser artist.

The third reason against Turgenev's general acceptance in the West is that Russia has something about her of the Orient, and that Turgenev had the Oriental melancholy and other attributes intensified to a special degree. Far from being completely occidentalised, as he imagined, the tinge and texture of his mind never abated their original quality. Oriental he was born, and (unlike Tolstoi, again) Oriental he remained. Though he preached an evangel, it was not an evangel of revolt and attack; rather an evangel of vague and quiescent hope, with dreamy eyes upon the furthest future. "Russian writers," says the Vicomte de Vogüé, "by reason as much of the circumstances in which they are placed as by the particular turn of their genius, do not openly attack; they neither argue nor declaim; they depict without arriving at a conclusion, and appeal more to pity than to anger." It is just the qualities of melancholy, inconclusiveness, and patient inactive faith which do not commend themselves to the Western mind, comparatively so strenuous, eager, and restive under abuses. We can neither understand nor sympathise with this policy of waiting and meditation. With us, to think is to act, and to act is to fight. When Uvar Ivanovitch answers the question: "Will there be men among us?" by "flourishing his fingers and fixing his enigmatical stare into the far distance," we chafe, we get angry. We feel the need of a watchword and a battle-cry. The true Russian does not.

From such deep-seated causes Turgenev's novels fail—at any rate, partially—in their moral suasion over the Western mind. Absolute resignation we could comprehend, and open rebellion we could approve; but a sad, uneasy something between the two leaves us cold and puzzled. Turgenev, I fancy, was aware of the racial defect, and aware also that Tolstoi had it not. Perhaps it was this knowledge which caused him to send across Europe to Tolstoi that pathetic and moving document.

"Very dear Léon Nikolaievitch," the missive ran,—"It is a long time since I wrote to you. I was then, and I am now, on my deathbed. I cannot recover; there is no longer the least chance of it. I am writing to you expressly to tell you how happy I have been to be your contemporary, and to make you a last urgent prayer. My friend, return to literary work. This gift has come to you from there whence everything comes to us. Ah! how happy I should be if I could know that you would listen to my prayer! . . . My friend, great writer of our Russian land, hear my prayer. Let me know if this letter reaches you. I clasp you for the last time to my heart—you and all yours. . . . I can write no more. . . . I am tired."

Things Seen.

1.30, October 31st, 1899.

At half-past one, when I stepped out into the street, the calamity met me. It was sudden as lightning. Something terrible had happened. The air was charged with awe. Anxiety, grief, horror, anger, stood plain on every face, and there facing me was the big, black-lettered placard: "Great Disaster—British Column Captured by Boers." The staring announcement provoked no comment, no interchange of views. Men struggled for the papers, read the news, then stood rigid, aghast, gazing at the placard: "British Column Captured by the Boers." It was inconceivable. But there, in the autumn sunshine, flared the placards, a dozen of them, varying in wording, but all crying the calamity: "Two Thousand Shot or Taken Prisoners." Everywhere the same sight met me. Everybody held a paper. Some read as they walked, others stopped in doorways; but on every face was the same amazement, as if to say—"The incredible has happened." We kept the thing to ourselves, that was the strange part of it. Talk would come later; but the first shock, like all great shocks, was individual, personal, incommunicable. I went into a restaurant to lunch. Outside stood a group of a dozen men—silent, tight-lipped, gazing at the placards. Within, the customary babble of talk was hushed. The place was thronged, but every man was silent, reading a paper propped before him, food neglected. I read, too—read this:

A MAN OF ROYAL IRISH FUSILIERS EMPLOYED AS HOSPITAL ORDERLY CAME IN UNDER FLAG OF TRUCE WITH A LETTER FROM THE SURVIVORS OF THE COLUMN AND ASKED FOR ASSISTANCE TO BURY THE DEAD.

Flag of truce—letter—survivors—to bury the dead. The words stabbed. They swam before the eyes. For a moment I felt the futility of going on with the minor affairs of life. Before this calamity all else seemed trivial. . . . Then somebody said to the waiter: "Baked apple-dumpling, please"; and in another column of the paper my eye caught the announcements of new books: Shall I Slay My Brother Boer? and Christian Mysticism: being the Bampton Lecture for 1899. Demy 8vo. . . .

The Note of Love.

A MOMENT ago, as I sat at my window watching the cheerless darkness fill the cold, eerie square, a little child—a ragged, pinched mite—went by, wailing with a thin, most lamentable cry, and by a strange freak my mind sped from the city and its chill to a scene in the far Highlands.

I had worked with the shepherds separating the ewes from their lambs, and now sat upon a knoll close by watching and listening. The bereaved ewes straggled over the heather—a spectacle pitiable and forlorn. Not a head went down to nibble, and the sad brown eyes of the beasts sought vacantly for the stolen lambs that were penned in the fank. The solemn immensity of the Highland scene was vibrant with innumerable sorrows—an untiring, tearless, poignant lamentation; it was like human despair past thought, pain past all assuaging. At the edge individual "meh-mehing" was distinguishable in long pathetic quavers, but from the heart of the flock the sound was as an organ's, resonant and loftily passionate.

At last the shepherds were driving home their flocks of stricken mothers, and, past where I stood, went to their accustomed ground—a doleful lot of blackfaced. The stolid shepherd stalked behind; the collies yelped, galloped "oot bye wide" and "backed in ahint"; and, despite the menace of the dogs, the ewes made reluctant progress. Ever they turned their sad, speckled faces to the fank, and "mehed" a dismal mourning with mouths gauntly open. Thus, with persistent looking back, and wailing from dry, sore hearts, they stood till the barking collies at their noses forced them on again.

I watched the flock till it passed from view, and, ere the sound of it had died away, a mincing, eager crunching on the bridle-path beside me called my attention. It was a weak, sickly-like, black-faced lammie trotting on the gravel. Its mouth gaped with panting, and every few yards it stopped to cry a long, thin, trembling cry.

I suppose it was the likeness of the baby's and the lammie's cries, the unerring note of love, that associated in my mind just now the city and the hillside.

A Scripture Lesson.

THE first question asked was, "What was the Bible originally written in?"

"Ink," was the prompt reply.

We then listened for some moments to a catalogue of our follies, the idiocy of boyhood, and so forth. At last we resumed.

"Tell them," the master said to the head boy of the class, "what the Bible was written in."

"Blood," sounded forth through the room.

Our Scripture lesson ended there for the time, and with a magnificent injustice the whole class was made to suffer for those two answers.

The Amateur Critic.

[FROM time to time we receive letters from correspondents in praise or disapproval of books new and old. In future, for awhile, we propose to put a page of the ACADEMY at the service of the unprofessional critic. To this page we also invite our readers to contribute remarks on striking or curious passages which they may meet with in their ordinary reading. No communication, we would point out, must exceed 300 words.]

Defoe on the Boer War.

PROBABLY very few readers of the ACADEMY know Defoe's poem "The Spanish Descent," published when the nation was agitated by the failure of Sir George Rooke to bombard Cadiz. Therein Defoe gently ridiculed the undue expectations of victory that had been formed, and pointed out that the reverse was of a temporary kind. Although the circumstances were so different from those which have occurred this week in South Africa, yet many of Defoe's lines seem curiously applicable to the present moment. May I show this?

Long had this Nation been amus'd in vain
With Posts from Portugal and News from Spain.
With Ormond's Conquests, and the Fleets success,
And Favours from the Moors at Maccaness.
The learned Mob bought Compasses and Scales,
And every Barber knew the Bay of Cales,
Show'd us the Army here, and there the Fleet,
Here the Troops Land, and there the Foes Retreat. . . .
But still they counted Spoils without the Cost,
And still the News came faster than the Post. . . .
And now the Farce is Acting o'er again,
The meaning of our Mischiefs to explain;
The Learned Mob O'er-read in Arms and Law,
The Cause of their Miscarriages foresaw.
Tell us the Loytering Minutes were Mispent
Too long a going, and too few that went.
Exalt the Catalonian Garrison,
The new made Works, the Platform and the Town:
Tell us it was impossible to Land,
And all their Batteries sunk into the Sand. . . .
The disproportion'd Force they Banter too,
The Ships too many, and the Men too few. . . .
From hence thro' France the Welcome Tidings fly,
To mock his ancient Sire with mushroom Joy.
Raptures possess the ambitious Heads of France,
And Golden Hopes their new Designs advance.
Now they Consult to Crush the World agen,
And talk of rifling Christendom for Men. . . .
In vain great Princes mighty Things Invent,
While Heaven retains the Power to prevent.
He that to General Mischief makes pretence,
Should first know how to Conquer Providence. . . .
Disaster swells the Blood, and Spleen the Face;
And ripens them for glorious Things apace. . . .
Life's the best Gift that Nature can bestow;
The first that we receive, the last which we forego:
And he that's vainly Prodigal of Blood,
Forfeits his Sense to do his Cause no good.
All Desperation's the Effect of Fear;
Courage is Temper, Valour can't despair. . . .

I may add that Sir George Rooke captured some rich galleons shortly after he had retired from Cadiz, and turned the public disappointment into calm jubilation.

Mr. Murray Gilchrist's Earlier Work.

LITERATURE has many surprises, and one of the most pleasant is the chance discovery of an unknown, if not unsuspected, faculty in one of our heroes. If, as it is to be feared, the earlier stories of Mr. R. Murray Gilchrist are but little known, then there are not a few who have a great pleasure in store for them. There are some, indeed, who have carefully followed his work since the publication of Passion the Plaything in 1890, and who week by week scanned the columns of the National Observer for those weird creations which occasionally appeared above his name. But it is to be regretted that Frangipanni and The Stone Dragon, and Other Stories, are the delight of only such a limited few. In the last-named of these books one is sometimes reminded of Poe, though Poe never paid much heed to finish; and finish, with attention to detail, is one of Mr. Gilchrist's happiest qualities. Like Poe's, his stories are often without clue as to date or locality, but one does not seek to know when or where the events occurred; for if it is a tale of witchcraft or sorcery it becomes a reality in that land of nowhere. When he gives a date he does something more by adapting his style to that of the period (which never seems later than 1800, though it is as often in the seventeenth century), and he brings one into contact with the time by a dozen ingenious devices, such as the mention of a book just published, or the allusion to an obsolete custom or an article of ancient dress. What could be more admirable than the beginning of "The Writings of Althea Swarthmoor," one of the most remarkable pieces in the volume:

A portrait of Althea Swarthmoor hangs in the library of the House with Eleven Staircases. She is depicted (by Kneller's brush) as a tall, thin woman of about thirty, somewhat fallow in the matter of complexion, and with deerhound eyes. Her crisp black hair is drawn plainly from an admirably arched brow, and there is a perplexed look about her lips.

This single example must suffice, but it will serve to show how the author takes one by the hand at once, how he fixes the date with Kneller's name, and suggests in the House with Eleven Staircases a tale of unhappy love of the woman with the "deerhound eyes."

"No. 5 John Street."

WHAT is the subtle secret that counts for success in a novel? What induces the public to clamour for one especial book to the exclusion of so many others? Why has No. 5 John Street been the record selling book of the year? There can be only one answer to these questions, is the exclamation that rings in my ears. The merit of a book proclaims its popularity, and its abounding merit takes the public by storm.

In my humble estimate of a book which has had such a remarkable success, I must deny its remarkable merits; as a novel I cannot even grant it ordinary excellence. In the first place, its story neither enchants nor enchains; there is no unity of design in it; it hangs loosely, like a threadbare coat, on a peg of socialistic theories. It is uneven, disjointed, and disappointing. It neither enlivens nor harrows, and the tragedy which ends it cannot enlist sympathy or strike awe. The scenes of the novel may be tinged with probability. There may be houses which partially resemble No. 5 John Street; but the people who inhabit it can have no existence in the realms of fact. And although these are drawn with a bold distinctness and vivid colouring, their lives and actions lack impressiveness and interest. A master hand might have woven a strong, harmonious story about these characters: Mr. Whiteing has only lodged them in his book and left them there to wander about without purpose or method.

This book is one of those novels with a purpose; a purpose to denounce ills, to rail at social inequalities and to awaken sympathy for those who labour under cruel and hard conditions. These diffuse interpolations may be useful and praiseworthy, but when they cloud a novel to choke its interest, I must unhesitatingly assert that the matter is in its wrong place. No. 5 John Street may appeal to students of social subjects, but it is certainly a most uninteresting and dispiriting novel.

Memoirs of the Moment.

CORNWALL has given very few generals to the British Army. It is curious, therefore, that the first victim general of the campaign comes from that county—the county that is, in other respects, more closely connected than any other in England with the Transvaal. Hatt, the home of the Symons family, is well known to many a Cornish miner who, balked of tin in his own country, has gone to the gold and diamond workings in South Africa. In the garden of the old house at Hatt General Symons used to be at his happiest, pottering in shirt-sleeves among his plants, which he loved to loiter among, regarding them affectionately with his solitary eye. Hatt is only a few miles over the border of Devon, the county of Sir Redvers Buller, who had to hear the bad news of the death of Symons when he landed on Tuesday at Cape Town.

WHEN the names of the fallen in South Africa are scanned from day to day, many an eye stays its descent of the news column when it comes to the end of the list of officers. Yet the more inquisitive or interested will discover among the dead in the ranks the names of families of position and importance. Take one case. The name of Trooper Hubert Joseph Wolseley appears in the final list of the dead at Elands Laagte. This mere trooper, whose portrait appears in no paper and of whom no line of obituary notice has been elsewhere written, was a kinsman of the Commander-in-Chief of the British Army. His father, Mr. Edward Wolseley, is the younger brother of Sir Charles Wolseley, of a long line of baronets. Young Wolseley was destined for the Navy, but asthma defeated his ambition. He “went into the city”; but the Stock Exchange wearied his heart, which was all the while in the hunting-field or on the athletic sports ground.

SOUTH AFRICA seemed an opening. Young Wolseley, tall almost beyond his strength, went to Johannesburg and took a post in connexion with the mines, which he relinquished two or three months ago, believing war inevitable. Then there came talk of peace, and the young man's spirit was stirred; he wrote home desponding of his country. Then war came; whereupon he penned a letter of high spirits at the prospect of fighting among the Imperial Light Horse; which, in fact, he did at Elands Laagte. His name was not returned among the dead at first, for his body was not found until six days after the fight; and only this week did his parents, in their Surrey home, hear for certain of their heavy loss.

THE Marquis Townshend was a man of many philanthropic ambitions. Very different were they from those of his brother-in-law, Sir Redvers Buller, who would find, when he landed at Cape Town, a cable announcing also his wife's loss of her brother. The Marquis Townshend was a supporter of People's Open Spaces, and an opponent of public-houses. Once he started a newspaper to flatter his projects; but it was the saddest of his experiences. The public did not buy the paper; and the dismissal of its editor led to an action against Lord Townshend, which Lord Townshend lost, but which established a precedent for dismissed editors in their demands for a “notice” of several months as “a custom of the trade.”

MISS FLORENCE MARRYAT, who has died in Bayswater this week, bore a name that has been adored by successive generations of schoolboys. Captain Marryat, R.N., C.B. (his titles are lost in his fame as a story-teller), had a large family; and his daughter Florence was only sixteen, and therefore much too young, when she became the wife of Captain Ross Church. When nursing her children through a fever she wrote her first novel—her first of some seventy novels! That they had a certain vogue their number suggests; that half their names are all known to any single individual it would be rash to aver.

MISS MARRYAT, who became in course of time Mrs. Francis Lean, had a turn for mental speculation. Spiritualism became her hobby; and the working-out, if that is the word, of religious problems her pastime. She adopted the Roman Catholic religion—which made her friends smilingly revert for the moment to her old name of Mrs. “R. Church.” Her life was not an altogether tranquil one. Perhaps her activities were rather forced upon her by circumstances than undertaken with a light heart—her recitations and play-writings and play-actings, her lectures, her entertainments, and the aforesaid seventy novels. This, at least, shall be her epitaph—she was a brave and a busy woman, as became her father's daughter.

THE Bath of Anstey, Austen, Fielding, and Dickens had its tribute from Lord Rosebery the other day. Other literary associations crowd the memory; but one that is perhaps unfamiliar to Lord Rosebery attaches to the name of Walter Savage Landor. From Bath it was that Landor wrote to Dr. Parr a letter that puts the case of author versus critic exactly as an author might most wish to see it. The Anti-Jacobin had attacked a poem of Landor's, and Landor, the man of quarrels, who yet wrote: “I strove with none, for none was worth my strife,” tells Dr. Parr in one sentence that if he discovers the critic it will be at the expense of the critic's skin, but adds in the next that he lets such insults pass. “Who,” says he, “would stop a cloud that overshadows his garden? The cloud is transitory; the garden blooms. Thank God, I have a mind more alive to kindness than to contumely. The statue of Memnon is insensible to the sands that blow against it, but answers in a tender tone to the first touches of the sun.” And then he turns to what is, after all, a real trouble, “now much more painful and more lasting”—the death of a friend:

Poor lamb! poor lamb! Poor little Elizabeth and her divine mother! What hours have I passed with this virtuous couple, never, never, to return. In vain have I tried every species of amusement. Her image rises up everywhere before me. Did she not treat me as a brother? Did she ever call me by more than one name? The sound of Walter was the sweetest of sounds.

RARELY can an author read with equanimity a hostile notice of his book. But Mr. Hichens, without a pang, one imagines, can read a depreciation in an important daily paper beginning: “About The Slave our opinion is quite clear. Neither plot, nor style, nor feeling delight us one jot.” Neither is one of two, not three; it is, moreover, disjunctive, and will not take a plural verb. This explanation of our grammatic criticism seems, at any rate, needed by the writer of the notice.

FROM an interesting article on his friend the late Grant Allen, which Mr. Lang contributes to the Daily News, we take this passage: “As an instance of his kind temper, I remember that he showed me proof-sheets of a novel in which I appeared as the villain. The personal portrait (apart from my series of heartless crimes) was flattering, but recognisable; and, at my request (for it could only cause gossip), the villain was altered out of all possibility of recognition. ‘The body is yours,’ he said, ‘but the soul is the black soul of —.’ The soul appeared to me to be that of the common miscreant of romance. However, Mr. Allen took very considerable trouble to make the body unrecognisable.”

Studies in Contemporary Style.

III.—The Gaudy Manner.

Mr. Kruger himself cannot be a victim of any such delusions, nor yet his brother President at Bloemfontein, who has so rashly taken up his cause.—THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

THERE is a double negative in this sentence; but that is not the error to which we would draw attention. The typical error lies in the phrase his brother President. "Brother" is used as an adjective; the word, therefore, in a scrutiny of the phrase, may be left out; and then we have his President. Now, Mr. Steyn is not Mr. Kruger's president, and thus the possessive pronoun is absurd.

The same reasoning applies to a phrase in another newspaper: Lord Salisbury and his colleague statesmen. The writer means "Lord Salisbury and his colleagues." The statesmen are not the property of the Prime Minister.

This is so clear that the typical error of this week may not seem worth discussing; but it is desirable to consider the matter. Often a breach of grammar springs from an intellectual frailty. It does in the cases which have been cited. Euphony and resonance are sometimes qualities pleasant in themselves; but when they are achieved at the cost of accuracy they are not more attractive than the inharmonious gauds with which yokels are bedecked at fairs. The writers in the Daily Telegraph seem to have the utmost difficulty in stating a fact plainly. They must needs, as it were, put it into a kaleidoscope, and make it appear to be something more than it is. Even as Mr. Steyn is not merely President of the Orange Free State, but also a brother of Mr. Kruger, so a man who has been fishing in the Thames, or elsewhere, is a "piscator," or "a disciple of Old Isaac," or "an individual who pursues the contemplative cult." Any fox-hunter whom there is occasion to mention is "a Nimrod"; and the twelfth of August begins "The Carnival of St. Grouse." Still, the people of England seem to consider the style of the Daily Telegraph very fine indeed.

Correspondence.

An Author's Complaint.

SIR,—Before purchasing the copyright of A Woman of the Commune from Messrs. F. V. White & Co. we specially approached them with reference to a change in the title, and it was only on the understanding that they on their part had no reason to anticipate the author would object to such change that we concluded our negotiations with them. The original title was not suitable for our class of readers, and for that reason, and not to make the book appear as new, we stipulated for its alteration. We have not to our knowledge received from or heard anything of a protest from Mr. Henty on this matter prior to seeing his allusion to the same in the letter from him you published.

As to the titles of two books by Mr. Henty following his name on our title-page, these were simply inserted in the same manner that we usually insert the titles of one or more books, previously issued by an author, when publishing another work by the same writer.—We are, &c., S. W. PARTRIDGE & CO.

SIR,—Mr. Henty's letter on what tricks may be played under an author's name leads me to mention a grievance of my own as to a book now beyond my control. Some time ago I sold the copyright of it to a publishing concern known as the Sunday School Union. Last season, without my knowledge, it was brought out under another title, with an alteration of the preface and the omission of one chapter, both of which passages involved the old title, the evident intention being to make this pass for a new book. As soon as I found out that a book was selling under a title chosen without even the courtesy of consulting the author, I protested—in vain. I am informed by publishers that such passing off of old books for new ones is quite contrary to the custom of the trade, and by lawyers that I might succeed in restraining such tampering with my work. I trust, at least, it will be understood how I am no party to a trick which seems a bad lesson for Sunday-schools.—I am, &c., A. R. HOPE.

Miss Braddon's Publishers.

SIR,—Our attention has been called to a paragraph in last week's ACADEMY in which allusion is made to an announcement that, for the future, "Miss Braddon is to publish through Messrs. Downey & Co." As this announcement appears likely to mislead both "the trade" and the public, we shall be obliged if you will allow us space to state, on the authority of Miss Braddon herself, that she has not the smallest intention of publishing her novels through the agency of any other house than our own.

On our advice, and following the example set by other popular authors and well-known publishers, Miss Braddon has arranged for the issue in sixpenny reprints of certain of her novels through Messrs. Downey & Co. These sixpenny issues are, of course, a thing apart from all the ordinary and more expensive editions of Miss Braddon's works, which now bear, and which will continue to bear, "the imprimatur" of your obedient servants,

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., LTD.

Lane v. Walter.

SIR,—A paragraph appeared in the ACADEMY of October 28 stating that the Publishers' Association had "taken up the matter of Mr. Lane's appeal in the case of Walter v. Lane," and that "Mr. Augustine Birrell and Mr. Scrutton were the counsel chosen by the Publishers' Association."

Will you kindly allow me to state, on behalf of the Association, that this information is inaccurate in both particulars. The Association rendered Mr. Lane some assistance in obtaining counsel's opinion, but beyond this they have taken no part in the matter.—I am, &c.,

The Publishers' Association, WM. FOULTEN,
Stationers' Hall, London, E.C. Secretary.

The Dragon-Fly and the Reviewer.

SIR,—In his interesting article entitled "English Satirists" your reviewer says Moore's satiric pieces are "gay and stinging as dragon-flies." It is a charming simile, but incorrect. Dragon-flies do not sting, they bite, and that pretty sharply, with beautiful, powerful jaws. I venture to think your reviewer could still keep his simile and yet give the dragon-fly his due.—I am, &c.,

E. CATHARINE ALLEN.

A Protest.

SIR,—I am obliged to your reviewer of my London Souvenirs for quoting—though with a view to censure—some of the passages of my book I particularly wish to impress on the public. But what mischievous goblin led him to read (on page 114) "indulgencing" for what I wrote—viz., "indulging," and thus justify him in saying that my sentences were "top-heavy"—whatever that may mean? As this is a matter of fact and not of opinion, will you kindly publish my protest against the charge of coining so barbarous a word as "indulgencing"?—I am, &c., C. W. HECKETHORN.

["Indulgencing" was a misprint. The word appeared in the proof as "indulgency," and was corrected; but error triumphed. Mr. Heckethorn, of course, wrote "indulging." The top-heaviness of the sentence remains.]

Split Phrases.

SIR,—E. H. has been good enough to refer in his second article on "Contemporary Style" to my letter on the "manifold uses of the Adverb," and I thank him for his courteous remarks.

I am very glad to have elicited from him the admission that neither split infinitives nor split indicatives are ungrammatical: this is a point gained, because, as you will see by the letter of Mr. Aymer Vallance, on p. 465, that writer tries (unsuccessfully, in my opinion) to show that a split infinitive is ungrammatical.

The accusation now is that both the "splits" are vulgarisms and do violence to the sense of style. This at once brings up the questions: What is a vulgarism? and Who is the judge of style? I assume that E. H. means by a vulgarism an expression used commonly by the lower, or at least the less educated, part of Society, and rarely, if ever, by educated people or good writers. Well, then, let us put the matter to the test and confine ourselves for the present to the lesser vulgarism.

My illustration "I heartily thank" was taken from the Prayer Book, and I think the compilers of that Book would not be considered vulgar even in our own day. Yet they use "we earnestly repent" and a number of similar expressions. I took at random a page in each of the following works: Mill's Logic, Newman's Apologia, Macaulay's Essays, each author being in his way a master of style, and I found split indicatives as follows: Mill, 6; Newman, 4; Macaulay, 2. In half a column of a Times leader I found six, and from your own contributions in the number of October 21, I gathered hastily the following:

"to be widely exploited" (infinitive)	page 457
"is nobly infatuated"	} 458
"does not so much write"
"he not merely insisted"	} 460
"he confidently demanded"

and nine more I had marked on page 464. Now, in the face of these examples, is it wise to insist upon calling the splitting of the indicative either vulgar or bad style? The fact is, both speakers and writers find that there is a distinct advantage to be gained by such an arrangement of the words in a sentence, and insensibly, in spite of the purists and pedants, the practice is spreading. It was my intention to give the reason for the spread of the practice, but this letter has gone beyond the space which you may care to allot to this subject: if, however, you will allow me in a future number to revert to it, I shall be glad to give the reason.—I am, &c., Coatham: October 23, 1899.

Our Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 6.—New Series.

THIS competition has proved so interesting that we are repeating it, with a certain modification, as the terms of No. 7 will show. We asked for passages of not more than sixty words from English prose-writers employing the power of simplicity rather than studied elaboration to convey swift, vivid pictures. The difficulty of judging has been considerable. For long we were divided between this passage from Mr. Kipling's Many Inventions, sent by Mr. E. Bond, The Rookery, Eye, Suffolk:

When the sea-mist veils all, St. Cecilia turns a hooded head to the sea and sings a song of two words once every minute. From the land that song resembles the bellowing of a brazen bull; but off shore they understand, and the steamers grunt gratefully in answer. and this from Vanity Fair, sent by Miss C. Lucas, Netherfield, Upper Tooting:

No more firing was heard at Brussels—the pursuit rolled miles away. Darkness came down on the field and city: and Amelia was praying for George, who was lying on his face, dead, with a bullet through his heart.

After much consideration, we have decided to give the prize to Mr. Bond, because fine though the Thackeray extract is, it is less in keeping with the terms of the competition. To Mr. Bond a cheque for a guinea has, therefore, been sent.

From the others we pick out these:

Geirmund went down clattering from the Hill and stood with his company. But a man came forth from the other side of the ring, and clomb the Hill: he was a redhaired man, rather big, clad in a akin coat, and bearing a bow in his hand and a quiver of arrows at his back, and a little axe.—From William Morris's "The House of the Wolfings."

[T. B. R., Dulwich.]

On shore I could see the glow of the great camp fire burning warmly through the shore-side trees. Someone was singing a dull, old, droning sailor's song, with a droop and a quaver at the end of every verse, and seemingly no end to it at all but the patience of the singer.—From Robert Louis Stevenson's "Treasure Island."

[Mrs. W. H. P., Alton.]

A team of her own horses stopped to drink at a pond on the other side of the way. She watched them flouncing into the pool, drinking, tossing up their heads, drinking again, the water dribbling from their lips in silver shreds. There was another founce, and they came out of the pond, and turned back again towards the farm.—From Thomas Hardy's "Far from the Madding Crowd."

[A. E., Oxford.]

The altar, save for the five flames of burning incense, was bare: no ornament, no flower was upon it: only the pure light ascending from the corners and from the midst of the altar glowed upon the simple, white beauty of the marble, the silver doors of the tabernacle, and the great alabaster reredos.—From Vincent Brown's "Two in Captivity."

[G. D., Horley.]

Best of all was to continue to creep up the long Grand Rue to the gate of the haute ville, and, passing beneath it, mount to the quaint and crooked rampart, with its rows of trees, its quiet corners and friendly benches where old women in such white frilled caps and such long gold earrings sat and knitted or snoozed.—From Henry James's "What Maisie Knew."

[M. I., London.]

Halfa has left off being a fortress and a garrison; to-day it is all workshop and railway terminus. To-day it makes war not with bayonets, but with rivets and spindle-glands. Railways run along every dusty street, and trains and trucks clank up and down till Halfa looks for all the world like Chicago in a turban.—From G. W. Stevens's "With Kitchener to Khartoum."

[A. R., London.]

A roomy painted cottage, embowered in fruit trees and forest trees, evergreens and honeysuckles; rising many-coloured from amid shaven grass-plots, flowers struggling in through the very windows; under its long projecting eaves nothing but garden tools in methodic piles (to screen them from rain), and seats where, especially on summer nights, a king might have wished to sit and smoke, and call it his.—From Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus."

[J. A. S. B., Edinburgh.]

I cannot call it colour, it was conflagration. Purple, and crimson, and scarlet, like the curtains of God's Tabernacle, the rejoicing trees sank into the valley in showers of light, every separate leaf quivering with buoyant and burning life; each, as it turned to reflect, or to transmit the sunbeam, first a torch and then an emerald.—From Ruskin's "Modern Painters."

[A. D., Shrewsbury.]

Setting Venice, where the faint-red Doge's palace was like the fading of another sunset north-westward of the glory along the hills. Venice dropped lower and lower, breasting the waters, until it was a thin line in air. The line was broken and ran in dots, with here and there a pillar standing on opal sky. At last the topmost campanile sank.—From G. Meredith's "Beauchamp's Career."

[E. T. P., Streatham.]

A light breeze, brisk and fresh, blew the land clear; only little patches of the morning mist hung torn and ragged about the furze-bushes. The forest was still densely veiled, but the sun was up, the larks aloft; the rains of over-night crisped and sparkled on the grass: there was promise of great weather.—From Maurice Hewlett's "The Forest Lovers."

[C. E. H., Richmond.]

A drove of fishes, painted like the rainbow and billed like parrots, hovered up in the shadow of the schooner, and passed clear of it, and glinted in the submarine sun. They were beautiful, like birds, and their silent passage impressed him like a strain of song.—From Robert Louis Stevenson's "Ebb-tide."

[Mrs. R. M., Glendevon.]

The water from its prolonged agitation is beaten, not into mere creaming foam, but into masses of accumulated yeast, which hang in ropes and wreaths from wave to wave, and where one curls over to break, form a festoon like a drapery from its edge.—From "The Ruskin Reader."

[R. C., Richmond.]

Down at the Porte Rouge the Hussars entered at a trot, trumpeters sounding the regimental march, while the crowd broke into frantic cheering, and tear-choked voices blessed them, and tear-stained faces were raised to the hard, bright sky, burnished with a fiercer radiance where the sun hung over the smoking Mendon woods, like a disk of polished copper.—From R. W. Chambers's 'Ashes of Empire.'

[N. S., Stratford-on-Avon.]

Announcements.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish in a few days the Italian text of Dante's Divine Comedy. This edition is founded on Witte's minor edition, the text of which has been carefully revised by Mr. Paget Toynbee, and it will form a volume of a new series of classics which Messrs. Methuen are publishing under the title of "Methuen's Standard Library." This Library will contain many masterpieces of literature, and each book will be edited with the greatest care by competent scholars. As a rule, the volumes will contain introductions and foot-notes, with long notes in the form of appendices. Prof. Bury's edition of Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, the seventh and last volume of which is almost ready, forms the first work of the Standard Library.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery-lane.

Miss Braddon's Novels.

NEW NOVEL, JUST PUBLISHED.

HIS DARLING SIN.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

THE AUTHOR'S AUTOGRAPH EDITION.

Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. ; picture boards, 2s.

ROUGH JUSTICE. [Now ready.]

"Miss Braddon, the queen of living English novelists."—Daily Telegraph.

"You would travel far before you reached the zone where the name of Braddon failed of its recognition. Miss Braddon is part of England ; she has woven herself into it ; without her it would be different. This is no mere fanciful conceit. She is in the encyclopædias ; she ought to be in the dictionaries, a common noun, for she stands for something which only school-boys need ask to be defined. So much for her position, in the national regard to-day."—The Academy.

"'Rough Justice,' one of the best of Miss Braddon's later novels, is now included in the publishers' small, pretty, and cheap edition of her works. The book is admirably printed, easy to hold, and very smart in its red-and-gold binding."—The World

PALL MALL GAZETTE, 8th March, 1898, says:—"In many ways the 'Britannica' is a work rather for the specialist than the ordinary man, whose wants are far better supplied by the brief but far more comprehensive notes of 'Chambers's.' Indeed, in the present form, 'Chambers's' is almost an ideal work of reference."

ENGLAND'S PIONEER TO INDIA AND BURMA.

RALPH FITCH: His Companions and Contemporaries By J. HORTON RYLEY, Member of the Hakluyt Society. Profusely illustrated. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

The remarkable story of the first Englishmen to cross India and penetrate to Burma and Malacca before the dawn of British trade in the East. Fitch and his brave companions, who were sent out by a small syndicate of London merchants in 1583 to discover the trade of India, were imprisoned by the Portuguese at Ormuz and Goa. Three of the party made their escape, and having been provided with a letter from Queen Elizabeth to Akbar, the great Mogul, proceeded to Agra. From this point Fitch continued his journey alone, and returned home in 1591. With the exception of one small excision, his quaint and graphic narrative is reproduced in full for the first time since Hakluyt gave it to the world 1598-1600. The author has provided historical and illustrative introductions to the various sections of the book, with numerous historical and geographical notes and explanatory of the inception and growth of the East India Company in which Fitch himself took a prominent part; the best authorities are duly quoted, and the book is designed equally for the library and for popular reading. There are a number of pen pictures of the men, his companions and contemporaries, with several portraits, not the least interesting being the story of Sir Edward Osborne, Lord Mayor of London, whose descendant became the first Duke of Leeds.

* Mr. UNWIN will send his AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENT LIST to any address post-free on application.

London:
T. FISHER UNWIN, 11, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.

Urgent Notice:

THIS is the last chance to obtain a copy of the limited edition of the Century Dictionary issued by "The Times" at a reduction of 45 per cent. from the publishers' price.

The subscription list is nearly filled, and the sale must inevitably be discontinued on or before Monday, the 20th inst. Orders should be sent to "The Times" at once, accompanied in each case by a preliminary payment of one guinea. The volumes are now ready for immediate delivery, but readers who desire to give a copy of the Century Dictionary as a Christmas Present—and it would not be easy to find a more appropriate gift—should mark their orders "For Christmas Delivery," so that delivery will not be made too soon. The volumes will in such cases be delivered to the carrier with instructions to effect delivery between December 20th and 24th.

THE BOOK.

The Century Dictionary consists of Eight Handsome Volumes. At once an Encyclopædia of Words and a Treasury of Facts, it may be said to yield more different kinds of information than any other work of reference in the world. It is a new work on a new plan—giving, for the first time, every form of spelling, pronunciation, and usage known, whether English, American, Australian, Provincial or Colloquial.

A GREAT UNDERTAKING.

The appearance of so remarkable a production as is The Century Dictionary in its perfected form is the great literary event of our time. Since the Ninth Edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" was completed no comparable undertaking has been accomplished. Its 7,000 pages contain more than 500,000 Encyclopædic Definitions—many of which might, indeed, be described as articles rather than definitions—while its 300,000 Explanatory Quotations and its 7,500 Beautifully Executed Woodcuts add both to the interest and to the utility of the work.

AN OBJECT LESSON.

The majority of purchasers of "The Times" Reprint of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" paid, in the aggregate, over £20,000 more for their copies of the work than they would have paid if they had acted promptly and procured their copies at the minimum price. When "The Times" first announced its issue of the Reprint, notice was given that the price would subsequently be increased. But more than half the purchasers failed to take advantage of the temporary opportunity, and, when they did buy, paid £30,000 more for precisely the same book. Will this happen again? The Century Dictionary is now issued by "The Times" upon the same plan of sale—a plan based upon the theory that first-comers ought to get the best of the bargain. In order to avoid sharing the loss which will probably be caused by a similar delay, you need only cut out the Order blank which appears on this page and send it to the Manager of "The Times," accompanied by a cheque for One Guinea. Is it not better to do that than to wait until it is too late to profit by the best of bargains?

SPECIMEN PAGES.—A richly illustrated pamphlet containing specimen pages from THE CENTURY DICTIONARY may be had, gratis and post free, upon application to the Manager of THE TIMES.

The Literary Week.

MR. LANE's appeal against the decision given in the case of the Times v. Lane, as to the ownership of the copyright of Lord Rosebery's speeches, has resulted in a reversal of the original verdict. That verdict, it will be remembered, asserted that the reporter of a speech is the sole owner of copyright therein to the exclusion of the brain that composed the speech. As Mr. Birrell pointed out the other day, this contention logically pursued would make the owner of the copyright of Paradise Lost not Milton, who wrote it, but Miss Milton, who acted as the poet's amanuensis. The new decision, with which we heartily agree, setting right such an absurdity, is unfortunately not yet law, for the Times has appealed against it to the House of Lords.

MR. SWINBURNE has during the week contributed to the Times another sonnet, wherein the objects of his contumely cease to be the Boers and become indiscriminately those who, with or without loss of loyalty and patriotism, can see any good in them. Mr. Swinburne, we fear, is by nature too intolerant, too impulsive, too sweepingly self-righteous, ever to make a right spokesman for a nation on such occasions as these. It is a time for silence or for profoundly sympathetic thought. The sonnet is a thinker's medium, and Mr. Swinburne has never been a thinker. His warmest and least critical admirers can hardly consider that his recent fourteen-lined utterances serve any necessary end.

In last week's Spectator was printed the following brief poem by Mr. Laurie Magnus, wherein Wordsworth's poetical condition as to emotion remembered in tranquillity, so persistently neglected by Mr. Swinburne, is fulfilled:

WILLIAM PENN SYMONS.

(MORTALLY WOUNDED IN ACTION AT GLENCOE ON OCTOBER 20; DIED OCTOBER 23, 1899.)

Till England's praise had reached thee, and our sore
And grateful hearts were to thy sight reveal'd,
Merciful death a little while forbore
To lay thee, where he smote thee, in the field.
Brave victor-victim of thy country's war,
Symons, sleep well! Thy mortal wound is heal'd.

AN interview in the Daily News with certain London booksellers concerning the book trade and the War reveals interesting facts. One is that Mr. Kipling's sales have been stimulated to some extent in the City, but not in the Strand. Another is that Mr. Rider Haggard's Jess has suddenly become a novel of the moment. The present crisis has also made Olive Schreiner a popular author once more. The public taste is, for the time being, more in favour of books on Africa and war than anything else. None the less, eight thousand copies of Red Pottage have been sold in less than three weeks, and a new edition of ten thousand is now in preparation. It is stories such as this which people hasten to read. Miss Cholmondeley's book has not a tithe of the art of "Zack's" On Trial, nor the dramatic seriousness of Mr. Raymond's No Soul Above Money, yet it has interest far beyond either.

IN a pleasant little open-air book, entitled Country Matters in Short, by Mr. W. F. Collier, a new criticism by Huxley is printed upon Shakespeare's lines:

The moon, methinks, looks with a watery eye;
And when she weeps, weeps every little flower,
Lamenting some enforced chastity.

Upon this Mr. Collier based a rather daring botanical theory, and he sent the essay to Huxley. Huxley replied:

Your Shakespeare parable is charming; but I am afraid it must be put among the endless things that are read in to the "divine Williams," as the Frenchmen call him. There was no knowledge of the sexes of plants in Shakespeare's time—barring some vague suggestion about figs and dates. Even in the eighteenth century after Linnaeus, the observations of Spengel, who was a man of genius, and first properly explained the action of insects, were set aside and forgotten. I take it that Shakespeare is really alluding to the "enforced chastity" of Dian (the moon). The poets ignore that little Endymion business when they like.

A Vie Véridique de William Shakespeare has just appeared in Paris from the pen of M. Georges Duval. According to an amusing account of the book by the Morning Post's literary gossip, it is a work of piquant charm. The Vie Véridique opens with the departure of Shakespeare from Stratford-on-Avon after the poaching affray in Charlecote Park. Says the expansive author: "The inhabitants, upon the threshold of their doors, awaited his passage, in order to wish a pleasant journey to a child of the country, obliged to expatriate himself."

THE Sonnets offer little difficulty. In the case of "L'Inconnue," we are told "Southampton has betrayed his friend. Shakespeare is thereby deeply wounded, but, at the sight of his blood, his first thought is that, under the hands of The Unknown, Southampton will bleed also." And this is the explanation of Shakespeare's long absence from his family: "Compelled to divide his life between work and pleasure, to compete with his rivals, a family would have been a hindrance. Besides, it was necessary for him to associate on intimate terms with such personages as Essex and Southampton, among whom the daughter of M. Hataway would probably have cut rather a poor figure."

WHITTIER's ballad of "Barbara Frietchie" seems a slight foundation upon which to base a four-act drama, but the thing has been done in America by Mr. Clyde Fitch, and it is being performed with success. "Shoot if you will this old grey head," says the patriotic Barbara in the poem; but a play about an old woman being too daring an innovation, Mr. Fitch has resorted to the device of making his heroine, who is young and blooming and in love, lose suddenly the rich and glossy chestnut of her hair, which, like Marie Antoinette's, turns white from grief. She is thus able, although thrusting a grey head from the window, to retain her romantic place in the sympathy of the audience. At least she was able, but the incident being received with uncontrollable laughter on the first night, this unusual capillary transformation has now been cut out.

WITH its number of November 4 Notes and Queries celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. Mr. Joseph Knight, the present editor, who reviews this jubilee in a leading article, refers humorously to the surprise displayed by some persons on learning that he is the editor. "What, you the editor of Notes and Queries!" they say, marvelling, apparently, that one man should be at the head of an organisation of such vast and curious erudition. The paper was founded by Mr. William John Thoms in 1849.

"If you would fain know more
Of him whose photo here is—
He coined the word Folk-lore,
And started Notes & Queries."

THE LATE WILLIAM J. THOMS IN HIS LIBRARY.

Mr. Thoms tried a kind of preliminary canter in the Athenæum, beginning in 1846, under the title "Folk-Lore," a term invented by himself, as his little poem, quoted above, proves; but, the space being limited, he enlarged the scheme into Notes and Queries. Peter Cunningham suggested for motto Cowper's lines:

By thee I might correct, erroneous oft,
The clock of history—facts and events
Timing more punctual, unrecorded facts
Recovering, and mis-stated setting right.

But Captain Cuttle's maxim, "When found make a note of," gained the place. Perhaps the best tribute to N. & Q. that has been written is the rondeau contributed to the Christmas number of 1882 by Mr. Austin Dobson, who has summed up so many things happily:

In N. & Q. we meet to weigh
The Hannibals of yesterday;
We trace, thro' all its moss o'ergrown,
The script upon Time's oldest stone,
Nor scorn his latest waif and stray.
Letters and Folk-lore, Art, the Play;
Whate'er, in short, men think or say,
We make our theme—we make our own—
In N. & Q.
Stranger, whoe'er you be, who may
From China to Peru survey,
Aghast, the waste of things unknown,
Take heart of grace, you're not alone:
And all (who will) may find their way
In N. & Q.

Long may the little paper flourish!

MR. BIRRELL'S address, at the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution, on the question "Is it possible to tell a good book from a bad one?" concluded with this summarising and not altogether cheering passage:

To tell a good book from a bad one, then, was a troublesome job, demanding, first, a strong understanding; second, some knowledge, the result of study and comparison; and third, a delicate sentiment. If they had some measure of these gifts, which, though in part the gift of the gods, might also be acquired and could always be improved, and could avoid prejudice—political prejudice, social prejudice, religious prejudice, irreligious prejudice, the prejudices of the place where they could not help being born, the prejudices of the University whither chance sent them, all the prejudices that came to them by way of inheritance, and all the prejudices picked up on their own account—if they could give all these the slip and manage to live just a little above the clouds and mists of their own generation, why then, with luck, they might be right nine times out of ten in their judgment of a dead author, and ought not to be wrong more frequently than perhaps three times out of seven in the case of a living author, for it was, indeed, a very difficult thing to tell a good book from a bad one.

AFTER Mr. Birrell had finished came Lord Rosebery with a pleasant commentary on the speech. We quote these passages:

May I offer one word of difference with Mr. Birrell?—and it is a very deferential difference. He says we ought to keep our dislikes to ourselves. I say that is not honest. If I did not like Obiter Dicta, I would tell him so. If I happened to like it extremely, I would still tell him so. . . . We do better in telling each other in confidence the authors we dislike. . . . I hold that in our chimney-corner, in the seclusion of our family circle, we are all the better for saying it, and being corrected for saying it if we have confessed to a dislike which is unnatural and unfounded. . . . It is dreadful to find a generation growing up who do not love, all of them, the Waverley novels, who do not all appreciate Jane Austen, who do not all delight in the gods and goddesses of our youth. Well, we can only hope they will grow older and know better. But, in the meantime, we can only arrive at taste by reading voraciously, omnivorously ourselves, and by a long course of painful indigestion arrive at the standard of what we ought to like and what we ought to dislike.

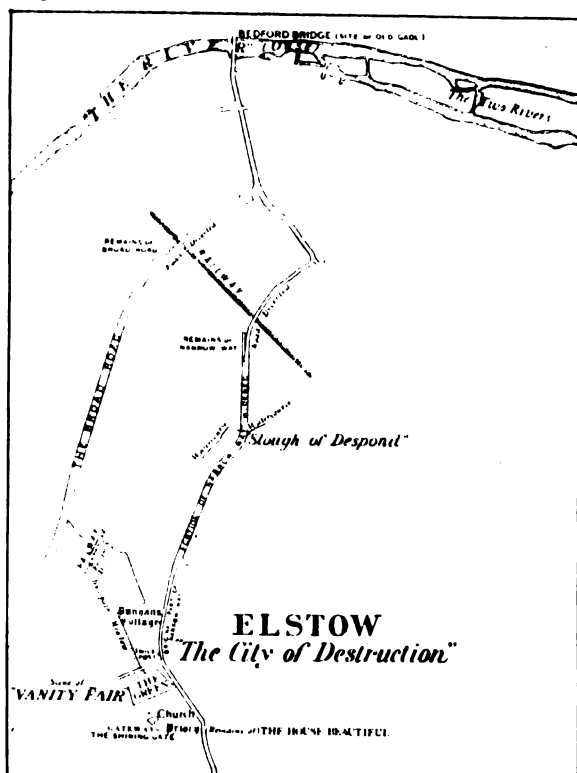

We were saying a little while ago that to lie quietly convalescent on a comfortable sofa and be birrellled to was an ideal way of spending the time. We meant the birreller to be Mr. Birrell; but Lord Rosebery can birrell too, and it would matter very little to us which officiated. Best, of course, would be a blend of both, as at Edinburgh. Indeed, Mr. Massingham and the other political critics who with painful frankness have been speculating upon Lord Rosebery's future might have found for him an agreeable occupation for all concerned in going about the country with Mr. Birrell—the one to lecture, and the other to commentate. We can vouch for it that they would draw immensely.

THE Ogilvie mentioned by Mr. Birrell, the Ogilvie of whom Lord Rosebery confessed that he knew nothing, but now probably knows quite enough, was John Ogilvie (1733-1813), a hymn writer and the author of allegorical and moral poems of inordinate windiness—Rona, in seven books, with a map of the New Hebrides, Britannia, in twenty books, and so on. Churchill, the satirist, called them tales of rueful length spun out under Allegory's flimsy veil. Ogilvie also wrote in prose The Triumphs of Christianity over Deism. But this is nothing: his real claim to distinction lies in the fact that it was to him that Johnson made the remark: "The noblest prospect, sir, which a Scotsman ever sees is the high road which leads him to England."

AMERICA has just lighted upon Mr. Bernard Shaw's Cashel Byron's Profession for the first time, an edition having been issued there lately by Brentano. Some reviewers are aware that it is old, some think it new, but all that we have seen admire it. Mr. Shaw's publisher in England might give the book a new dress, for the benefit of the many persons who have not read it. And there are other novels, too, from the same hand, that no one now has a chance of reading.

MENTION of Mr. Shaw reminds us that he is among the contributors to the new weekly paper, The Review of the Week, the first number of which was published last Saturday. This paper, which is attempting to do for a penny what other papers charge sixpence or threepence for, promises well. Among the contributors to the first number—in addition to Mr. Shaw, with a defence of the truthfulness to life of a passage in "The Devil's Disciple"—are Mr. Churton Collins, Mr. George Gissing, Mr. Morley Roberts, and Sir Charles Dilke.

THE new number of The Anglo-Saxon Review contains, among other interesting contributions, an ingenious article by Mr. J. F. Fasham on the Pilgrim's Progress, wherein he endeavours to prove that the topography of that book was based upon the topography of Bunyan's home. Mr. Fasham shows how much of Bunyan's godless youth was spent at Elstow, where upon the Green a famous fair was regularly held, and how his later life in Bedford was greatly concerned with religious observances. Hence the one may well have typified the City of Destruction and the other the Celestial City. But this would be merely fanciful hypothesis did not Mr. Fasham back it up by a map of Bedford and Elstow, which we reproduce, and the relation of the book to it. Thus:

"Taking Elstow Green, where a fair is still held, as the site of the City of Destruction, it may be noted that there is immediately 'on the left-hand side of the road a meadow and a stile to go over it,' and that meadow is called By-path Meadow. How many thousands of lovers of the Pilgrim's Progress have taken the 'by-path' leading from the 'narrow way' (as the road from Elstow Green to Bedford was, and still partly is) to the 'broad road' (from Ampthill to Bedford)." The Ouse dividing makes the river of life and the river of death. The Slough of Despond was about half-way between Elstow and Bedford: it is still damp, and years ago it must have been very bad. Mr. Fasham's speculations may well be rightly grounded: they only make Bunyan's imagination the more wonderful, so to transfigure a very ordinary piece of English country.

CANON AINGER writes to the Western Daily Press: "It is proposed by friends of the late Mrs. Emma Marshall, of Clifton, the well-known authoress, to place in Bristol Cathedral (if the sanction of the Dean and Chapter be obtained) a tablet, or other memorial, in recognition of the high and pure quality of her literary work, and of the services she thereby rendered, especially to the young. . . . If the response to this appeal should be adequate, it is further proposed to apply any sum in excess of that required for the memorial for the benefit of such of Mrs. Marshall's daughters as may seem most to need some provision, beyond the very small income to which they became entitled at their mother's death. Donations, marked 'The Emma Marshall Memorial Fund,' may be sent to Messrs. Prescott & Co., the Old Bank, Clifton; or to Mrs. E. Burrow Hill, or the Rev. J. Gamble, Leigh Woods, Clifton, who have kindly consented to act as secretaries."

For their new edition of Stevenson's best story, Treasure Island, Messrs. Cassell have prepared a fresh cover, a reproduction of which we give. We have before remarked that pictorial covers such as this are not entirely to our taste; but if they are done, it is certainly such books as Treasure Island that require them. In the present case the spirit of the story is suggested very well and attractively.

THE following passage is from the preface to Mr. William Archer's Study and Stage:

We are apt, I think to draw too hard-and-fast a line between literature and journalism, and to ignore, if not the existence, at any rate the right to exist, of the debatable land between the two. We assume that there is, or ought to be, no middle course between addressing our remarks exclusively to the passing day, and ridiculously essaying to shout them down the vista of the ages. As soon as a piece of writing appears between two boards (or even in paper, stitched) we apply to it the standard of a colossal abstraction named LITERATURE, and finding it, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, pitifully below that standard, we cry: "Out upon it! Why cumbereth it the ground?" But I submit that, as there is in fact, so there ought to be of right, a wide borderland between the absolutely ephemeral and the would-be eternal. After all, there are other measures of time than the day, or even the week. We do not step from Saturday night straight into kingdom-come. It is possible, and surely legitimate, to aspire to a literary life of six months or a year, without making any ludicrous assault upon immortality.

THE "Kipling Kalendar for 1900," for which many persons have been waiting, is an imposing work of art. The Kalendar itself is merely the ordinary tear-off packet of three hundred and sixty-five slips of paper each containing a sentence from the works. This is faced by a reproduction of the Hon. John Collier's portrait of Mr. Kipling. The background to the Kalendar is a design in brass tinfoil, by Mr. Lockwood Kipling, representing Jungle animals and Mowgli. At the top is a portrait of Mr. Kipling and his swastika between two elephants' heads. This portrait is the weak spot, for it is much more like Mr. Alfred Austin than our unofficial Laureate. The price of the Kalendar is half-a-guinea, for which sum one may buy The Day's Work, The Seven Seas, and two copies of A Fleet in Being.

THE Blackwood critic who deals out judgment "Under the Beard of Buchanan" allows no half measures in praise of Stalky & Co. Of Mr. Kipling's work he says: "The prose and poet laureate of the empire, he has interpreted for us alien peoples and foreign countries; he has fathomed the inmost traditions of our army and navy; he has wrested even its secret from the jungle. But harder than all this is the work of retrospection involved in the effort to portray school-life in a manner at once true to fact and at the same time recognisable as literature. That Mr. Kipling has succeeded triumphantly we confidently affirm." This is to say that Stalky & Co. is a greater feat than the Jungle Books. Maga's detailed proofs of this contention would be very interesting. In the same Blackwood, by the way, will be found a charming account of "A South Sea Arcady," by Mrs. A. S. Boyd, the wife of the artist who illustrated Stevenson's "Lowden Sabbath Morn."

WE were in error last week in referring to the half-crown edition of Far from the Madding Crowd as the first volume of a new edition of Mr. Hardy's novels. It is one of a series of copyright novels by various authors which Messrs. Harper are issuing.

MISS ELIZABETH HODGES, author of Some Ancient English Homes, The Cabots and The Discovery of America, and various papers of archaeological and historic interest, has received from the First Lord of the Treasury a grant of £100 to enable her to prosecute her researches.

By a slip of the pen, Miss Douglas King's new novel, A Bitter Vintage, was last week called A Bitter Vengeance.

Bibliographical.

AN indefatigable veteran is Mr. John Hollingshead. Of late years he has been most prominent, perhaps, as the organiser of "benefits" for other people, but he has never quite given up the use of his pen. Only the other day he wrote A Lyceum Historiette, containing the history of that theatre in brief. Now it is announced that he is about to publish a collection of his fugitive articles under the title of According to My Lights. His latest book was his Gaiety Chronicles, in which he again went over a good deal of the ground covered by his autobiography (My Lifetime). Before that came a booklet called Niagara Spray, and before that, again, another booklet about Leicester Square. In a yet earlier volume, Footlights, he dealt in the main with theatrical matters, his knowledge of which is extensive and peculiar. It is a characteristic of him that his first publication was entitled Plain English. Mr. Hollingshead has always wielded a style notable for its clearness and directness, and, for my part, I think that, when he became a theatrical manager, a good journalist was spoiled. It is difficult to believe that he is seventy-two.

Bibliophiles will, I think, like the general get-up of Stevenson's Letters when they see the volumes. The binding, with its paper title, is agreeably neat, and the paper and the type used are all right; acceptable, too, are the "tops" of burnished gold. Nothing could be more tasteful than all this; but I confess I do stick at the end-papers, which seem to me grandiose both in colour and in design. A quieter end-paper would have better pleased the deponent. While I am about it, too, let me express regret that the new Life of Millais is printed on paper so highly glazed. There are certain lights in which, owing to the sheen on the paper, the letterpress is difficult to read; moreover, paper of this species is particularly open to the bad effects of scratches, which, in my copy, have very much impaired some of the black-and-white pictures.

As Others See Us is the title of a new story by Watson Dyke. It was under a similar title that Mr. George Allen began to issue a series of books on England by foreign visitors—a series which was brought to a somewhat sudden and abrupt conclusion. The phrase, "as others see us," being part of a line by Burns, is, of course, not copyright as the name of a volume or volumes. I see Mr. W. E. Norris has written a novel named The Flower of the Flock, while Mr. Le Queux has written, or undertaken to write, a story called An Eye for an Eye. Such phrases, to be sure, are common property, and if, as I seem to remember, they have been used by fictionists before now, no one has very firm ground for complaining.

A certain publishing firm advertises, under the head of "New Novels," Mr. F. W. Robinson's Anne Judge, Spinster. This, of course, is obviously a blunder; but, such is the ignorance of the new generation, I should not be surprised if the mistake were accepted by many for gospel. Yet Anne Judge, Spinster ought to be as well known as John Halifax, Gentleman.

The "Bibelots" is so charming a series that it seems a pity the editor should include in it, as he proposes to do, matter so hackneyed and so readily accessible as Marcus Aurelius' Reflections and Keats's Poems. Long's translation of the former is existent in a neat and handy form, and editions of the latter are legion. Why not go further afield?

Very enthusiastic is the late Mr. J. R. Lowell in the "Verses Written in a Copy of Shakspeare" which find a place—better late than never—in the current issue of the Century magazine:

Get all experience, and at last it is
But as a key to part decypher his;
Observe, think, morals draw, part false from true,
He did all long ago, and better too;
Go, seek of Thought some yet unsullied strand,
His footprint there confronts you as you land.

These words of eulogy will surprise no one who has read the essay entitled "Shakespeare Once More," which appeared in the English edition of Mr. Lowell's Among My Books in 1870. "It may be reckoned," Mr. Lowell then wrote, "one of the rarest pieces of good luck that ever fell to the share of a race, that (as was true of Shakespeare) its most rhythmic genius, its acutest intellect, its profoundest imagination, and its healthiest understanding should have been combined in one man." The whole essay is one of the most suggestive in the whole wide range of Shakespeare criticism.

The verses which Mr. James Rhoades has been contributing to the papers lately carry me back in thought to the early seventies, when a certain "J. R." was a tolerably regular rhymers in the Spectator. Some of his rhymes were so good that there were people who incontinently ascribed them to John Ruskin! Such is the misleading quality of initials. By-and-by the real authorship leaked out. Mr. Rhoades has hardly fulfilled, as a poet, the promise of the Spectator days. He has published, I believe, two or three volumes of verse, the latest (apparently) being Teresa, and Other Poems (1893). I fancy, also, that he has written something for the stage. But I fear that the total impression made upon the great "B. P." has been but small, and that the "James Rhoades" appended to his newspaper effusions has conveyed next to nothing to the minds of those who have perused these performances.

The late Rev. Charles Mackeson can scarcely be said to have been a man of letters. However, he did something more than compile the Church Congress annual and edit the Church paper called the Banner. He edited for a long time the Churchman's Shilling Magazine, to which he imparted a decided literary flavour, with (let us hope) some good results. He had a considerable knowledge of music, and for some years conducted a weekly called the Choir.

From Art to Prosperity.

The Life and Letters of Sir John Everett Millais. By John Guille Millais. 2 Vols. (Methuen. 32s.)

A LITTLE time before his death Millais met Philip Calderon in Kensington-gardens. "It will kill me," he said, pointing to his throat, and gasping his words. "But," he added, "I am ready, and not afraid; I've had a good time, my boy, a very good time!" That is Millais's biography. What a good time he had!—and he knew it. It is the most touching and illuminative story in the book. He had had what we all want—a good time—and he knew it. Strictly speaking, there is no more to be said when a man can say that with Millais's bluff conviction. We would congratulate him, wave him adieu with an unwonted flourish, and turn again to the sombre crowd. Impossible to suppress this instinct of glad and swift farewell, this impulse to sum in a phrase what a phrase can so seldom sum.

For a long recital of success is but moderately interesting. Man is organised for sorrow and inured to failure and frustration. And when we look to see how other men have fared, and the great ones of the past go wandering by, it is on the men of sorrows that we fix our gaze. We have a feeling that we can finish their lives for them. We possess their uncaptured dreams. We know better than they why they failed, and the knowledge endears them. But the finished, and clever, and rewarded man! Of him one says: "His life was gentle, and the elements so mixed in him that Nature could stand up and say to all the world: 'This was a man.'" A fine verdict, yet one that leaves the mind cold and incurious. Somehow, we do not say this thing of Cæsar, that was said of Brutus; yet Cæsar interests us as Brutus does not. We do not speak so of Nelson, nor of Johnson, nor of Robert Louis Stevenson.

A verdict so calm and round should be briefly, as it must be seldom, delivered. It is the true and sufficient verdict on Sir John Everett Millais, but his son delivers it in nine hundred and eighty-four pages of ultra-glazed paper. He uses every device to repeat and support the undeniable propositions that Millais lived a successful life, and was a good fellow. In these two volumes, weighing almost half a stone, the reader who reads to talk may furnish himself with conversation for a year. Endless the banquet of anecdote and eulogy. Other pens are enlisted to prolong the needless triumph, and when all seems over the Poet Laureate is brought up, like a last reserve, to sing:

Death, the kind pilot, from his home,
But speeds him unto widening foam,
Then leaves him, sunk from sight, to roam
The ocean of his fame.

It is all well meant, and in a measure true; but we may wish, without offence, that Mr. Millais had inherited his father's knowledge of perspective. A nature so simple and intelligible as Millais's, an achievement so measurable as his, could have been treated in a third of the space with thrice the effect. For the real scale and scope of Millais's life are as easily apprehended as one of his pictures, and in biography, where the goal is known and the man measurable, a long work is a weariness. One does not like to speak slightly or, as it may seem, ungenerously of a tribute so laborious and filial as this. But if critics have duties, and biography is an art, these things must be said.

Briefly, then, the quality of this book is something like the square root of its quantity. Perhaps the arithmetic is too harsh. We are not in the least desirous of representing it as a dull book; dull it is not. Much of it is deeply interesting to those into whose lives the pictures of Millais have entered as a kind of separate and radiant pictorial element. Moreover the man was so fresh, vigorous, honest, and so in love with life: he saw so much worth seeing, kept such good company, was so much out and about in the world, and was so in tune with his time, that he seems to nudge and invigorate the reader.

The distinction—so frequently a strong one—between the man and the artist is slowly and surely obliterated in these voluminous pages. We see that Millais was a man of the highest health and energy, on whom nature had conferred rare executive faculties in drawing and painting. He applied these faculties with the same vigour and temporary concentration as he played a salmon in the Blackwater or shot deer in the passes of Loch More. The notion that Millais had an early period of deep artistic feeling which he outgrew is not wholly wrong, but it requires very careful statement. We refer, of course, to his association with Holman Hunt and Dante Gabriel Rossetti in the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. We shall not attempt to define Pre-Raphaelitism anew, or discover precisely what Millais gave and what he received as a member of that remarkable group. Mr. John Guille Millais is so severe on critics, and points out their "great mistakes," and their "common mistakes," and their "ignorance" with such gusto, that we prefer to remain outside the zone of his fire. We conceive, in our amateur way, that in the most flush and poetic years of his youth Millais partly adopted, and partly submitted to, the "Pre-Raphaelite" idea of painting. He was associated with young men who excelled him in powers of thought and also in depth of imagination. Then, if ever, he had the opportunity to deepen his artistic soul. Rossetti's vague and delicate spiritual yearning and Holman Hunt's intense religious feeling might conceivably have awakened in Millais some latent and vital principle of work and purpose which should have dominated his life. But no influences could confer such a principle. And the salient fact is that Millais emerged from his Brotherhood days without such a principle. He had found there only what he brought. He had increased his patience, he had refined his conscience, he had widened his physical vision, and we need not hesitate to add that he had tendered and deepened an imagination that was ever more constructive than penetrating. But the chances of Millais ever becoming a prophet were non-existent as ever. There is something very ingenious (may we say filial?) in the way that Mr. Millais describes his father's attitude to purpose in art. Take this passage:

Mr. Ruskin held that art should be a great moral teacher, with religion as its basis and mainspring; but Millais, while agreeing with much of that critic's writings, was never quite at one with him on this point. He certainly held that Art should have a great and abiding purpose, giving all its strength to the beautifying or ennoblement of whatever subject it touched, either sacred or secular; but though himself at heart a truly religious man, he could not harp on one string alone, nor would his impulsive originality, absolutely untrammelled by the opinions of others, allow him to paint pictures in which he had no heart at the dictation of any man, however eminent.

Thus, against the religious preoccupation of Holman Hunt and the moral preoccupation of Ruskin, Mr. Millais puts his father's reluctance to "harp on one string" and his "impulsive originality." But what are these but filial disguises of the fact that whereas Hunt had a harp-string and Ruskin a theory, Millais had neither. He had "impulsive originality," which is simply another way of saying that his faculties were not touched to defined issues, were not in the reins of an embracing purpose. And that is the truth. Millais remained through all his later life a brilliant executant on a popular level of thought and feeling.

It is sad to think that the painter who promised to become great became only popular. Yet so it was. When the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood ceased to warm and direct and inspire his energies Millais stepped into the primrose path. It is odd that in 1859, when he had two such beautiful pictures as "The Vale of Rest" and "Apple-Blossoms" on the walls of the Royal Academy, he should have been thrown into a mood of anguish because these works did not immediately find purchasers. However, his tribulation was short. The pictures were sold, and from this date onward Millais seems to have thought more of making his art profitable than significant. In 1863, when Millais exhibited that trivial thing "My First Sermon," he was, in his son's estimation, "at the summit of his powers in point of both physical strength and technical skill, the force and rapidity of his execution being simply amazing." It may have been so. No one denies that force and rapidity marked Millais's later work. But the force was mainly physical, and the rapidity was mainly injurious. It was in this year (1863) that Millais wrote R.A. after his name. The mere catalogue of his work done after this date would exhaust our space. He became the splendidly remunerated painter of prime ministers and pretty children. He built himself a fine house in Kensington, and his rifle rang out on Braemore and Dunrobin. He was granted the gold "Medaille d'Honneur." He was made a baronet. He received commissions from royalty; his "Cherry Ripe" was hung in every cottage, and was hailed with rapture by Australian miners and South African trekkers. Lord Beaconsfield, Mr. Gladstone, Cardinal Newman, Tennyson, and John Bright sat to and with him, and wrote him familiar epistles. But success elbowed art out of his studio. And the worst of it was, that he seems to have had no regrets.

He enjoyed every inch of the way. He was gloriously egotistical, talking about himself in the happy, boisterous way of a boy. He had a boy's spirit and emotions. His work, says his son, was his "lifelong joy"; but he loved its rewards too well, and he had them in abundance. In 1896, to his deep gratification, Millais was elected President of the Royal Academy. In 1839 he had joined the Royal Academy school, the youngest student that ever entered its walls. He had gained every honour from the Academy and every reward from the world. He had had the best of good times. Nor, in a sense, is Millais less than happy in his biographer. For the real man may be found (if he is sought) in these lavish volumes of praise and pictures. Though we wish that a thousand irrelevancies and much rash eulogy had been left out, we recognise the loyal and painstaking character of the record.

The New Swinburne.

Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards: a Tragedy. By Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

We should have been glad to find in Rosamund a successor to Chastelard and the other works by which Mr. Swinburne made and sustained his dramatic reputation. But we cannot disguise from ourselves, nor can a pardonable complaisance cause us to refrain from saying, that Mr. Swinburne has in this play fallen below his own accepted mark. The motive is the well-known historical legend regarding the death of that Attila of the Lombards, Alboin—or Albovine, as Mr. Swinburne has it, following the Latinised form Albovinus. It is said that he was murdered at a banquet, on the instigation of his Queen, the daughter of an Italian prince whom he had conquered and slain; the reason being that he compelled her to drink from a cup formed out of her own father's skull. It is a little curious that two distinguished modern poets should have sought inspiration in the fate of two great barbarian conquerors. Mr. Meredith based his fiery Attila on the story that the terrible king of the Huns was killed in his tent by a female captive whom he had forced to nuptial-rites (though he did not, like Alboin, make her his wife). But Rosamund does not repeat the success of Attila. According to Mr. Swinburne's plot, Albovine is troubled with doubts whether his Queen can love the slayer of her father, and so, in an evil hour, contrives the gruesome test of the skull-goblet. The Queen, Rosamund, dissembles her agony; but, having retired from the banquet at which the insult was inflicted upon her, thinks only of revenge. Albovine's young and trusted captain, Almachildes, is in love with her attendant maiden, Hildegard. She selects the young warrior for her instrument, and Hildegard as the bait to draw him into her trap. Having first drawn from the maiden an oath to do whatever service she requires, she then unfolds that service. Hildegard, on the pretext that the Queen will only allow their marriage if it be necessary to save her handmaiden from shame, is to tempt him to a midnight assignation, in which the Queen herself is to supply Hildegard's place. The handmaiden, under terror of her oath, reluctantly carries out Rosamund's command. Almachildes refuses to believe her without an interview with the Queen, from whom he discerns the instigation to have come. Rosamund succeeds in persuading him that there are secret reasons why only so can she bring about the marriage. Subsequently she accuses him to the King of dishonouring Hildegard; but when he declares that it was only done to secure their future union, Albovine gives consent to the wedding. Rosamund then reveals to the young captain that she supplied Hildegard's place, and calls on him to kill Albovine. He resists. She threatens a false accusation against Hildegard of having sought her own dishonour, which will bring her to the stake. Under pressure of this he gives way. A first attempt to follow and strike Albovine fails. Then she entreats the King that in a second banquet, by way of showing her forgiveness for his insult, they shall once more drink together out of her father's skull. He had resolved to bury the relic, in remorse, but yields to her solicitation. By way of making secure, like Hamlet's stepfather, she poisons the wine, in case Almachildes should fail her. But he does not fail. At the moment Albovine takes the skull of poisoned wine, to drink to her before the assembled chiefs, the young warrior rises and stabs him. With an exclamation of the "Et tu, Brute," kind, he dies. The Queen Rosamund, in a few brief lines, explains that she has no time to explain anything, and drinks off the skull of poison. Albovine's oldest comrade enjoins:

Let none make moan, this doom is none of man's—which, since he is quite in the dark about the affair, is a remarkably philosophical acceptance of faits accomplis; and the tragedy ends. No one is arrested: Almachildes is not so much as asked to account for his sudden indiscretion with the knife. And the reader is left with a feeling that Rosamund's little sensation has not come off. Certainly, Mr. Swinburne's sensation falls unexpectedly flat.

What is one to say of this? As a matter of construction, there seems a quite unnecessary machinery of diabolical intrigue. If Rosamund's word was so all-powerful with Albovine as Mr. Swinburne represents, she could surely have threatened a false charge against Hildegard (and thereby secured the compliance of Almachildes) without the wanton infamy of surrendering herself to the youth. Considering its monstrosity, this act has surprisingly little effect on what follows, and seems to have been introduced mainly to make our blood run cold. Our blood does not run cold, under the circumstances: we feel merely disgust where we are evidently meant to feel tragic horror. Otherwise (but it is a large otherwise), the plot has its possibilities of power. Those possibilities (we say with regret) are not carried out in the execution. As regards general execution, the best scene is that of the initial banquet, where Rosamund is made to drink from her father's skull. Here there is considerable dramatic grip over the situation, and one looks forward hopefully to accumulative development. But it does not come. What should be the exceedingly powerful situation, where Queen Rosamund discloses to young Almachildes the identity of the supposed Hildegard of his midnight assignation, quite fails in tragic force. It proves simply insignificant, unmoving. And the singularly lame and abrupt dismissal of the climatic scene—as though the author were weary, and finished the thing off summarily—we have already indicated.

The characterisation is shadowy. Albovine makes no impression, Hildegard is nothing, Almachildes less than nothing. One can understand that Mr. Swinburne designed to throw his strength into the character of Rosamund. It is just a character to attract the delineator of Mary Stuart. Rosamund is by way of being one of those gloriously dangerous women, deadly strong in beauty, love, and hate, whom Mr. Swinburne has ever loved to draw. But any of his disciples might have drawn Rosamund.

That is what one must finally say of the drama. Except in a trait here and there, the old glories of the Swinburnian blank-verse are lacking. The opulent diction and imagery are gone. The language of the play is direct, simple, clear; but it rises to no high poetical level. The speech of Rosamund after the King's outrage on her is a good average specimen of the style:

I am yet alive to question if I live,
And wonder what may ever bid me die.
But live I will, being yet not dead with thee,
Father. Thou knowest in Paradise my heart.
I feel thy kisses breathing on my lips,
Whereto the dead cold relic of thy face
Was pressed at bidding of thy slayer last night,
And yet they were not withered: nay, they are red
As blood is—blood but newly spilt—not thine,
Father! None lives that knew thee now save me,

And none loves me but thou nor thee but I,
That was till yesternight thy daughter: now
That very name is tainted, and my tongue
Tastes poison as I speak it. There is nought
Left in the range and record of the world
For me that is not poisoned: even my heart
Is all envenomed in me. Death is life,
Or priesthood lies that swears it: then I give
The man my husband and thy homicide
Life if I slay him—the life he gave thee.

That has a certain strength, but it would have been nearly as strong in prose, from which it is not far removed. Of course, now and again there are flashes of the poet we remember. Such is Rosamund's phrase to Almachildes:

Brainless art thou not,
No sword with man's face carven on the heft
For mockery more than truth or help in fight.

That is a fine image. Beautiful, too, is the love-speech of Albovine to Rosamund:

Thy voice was honey-hearted music, sweet
As wine and glad as clarions; not in battle
Might man have more of joy than I to hear it,
And feel delight dance in my heart and laugh
Too loud for hearing save its own. Thou rose,
Why did God give thee more than all thy kin
Whose pride is perfume only and colour, this Music? No rose but mine sings, and the birds
Hush all their hearts to hearken.

That is something of the old Swinburne. But for the most part the old Swinburne is grown faint and unrecognisable in Rosamund. And the Swinburne who has taken his place, if he has lost all his extravagance, has also lost much of his power.

"His Name Was Leisure."

The Natural History of Selborne. By Gilbert White.
Edited by the late Grant Allen. Illustrated by Edmund H. New. (Lane. 22s. net.)

ALTHOUGH White's Selborne was first published in 1789, and a constant stream of editions has been flowing ever since the 'thirties of this century, it was probably Lowell's charming appreciation in My Study Windows which gave the book its best impetus. Since looking through the handsome edition which Mr. Lane has just published—the noblest that has yet appeared—we have read again Lowell's "Garden Acquaintance" essay, and thereby have quite lost heart to say things of our own concerning the Selborne naturalist—Lowell's honeyed words so gaily and fittingly sum up both man and book. One passage, indeed, we must quote here:

The great events of Mr. White's life, too, have that disproportionate importance which is always humorous. . . . In 1770 he makes the acquaintance in Sussex of "an old family tortoise," which had then been domesticated for thirty years. It is clear that he fell in love with it at first sight. We have no means of tracing the growth of his passion, but in 1780 we find him eloping with its object in a post-chaise. "The rattle and hurry of the journey so perfectly roused it that, when I turned it out in a border, it walked twice down to the bottom of my garden." It reads like a Court journal: "Yesterday H.R.H. the Princess Alice took an airing of half-an-hour on the terrace of Windsor Castle." This tortoise might have been a member of the Royal Society if he could have condescended to so ignoble an ambition. It had but just been discovered that a surface inclined at a certain angle with the plane of the horizon took more of the sun's rays. The tortoise had always known this (though he unostentatiously made no parade of it), and used accordingly to tilt himself up against the garden wall in the autumn. He seems to have been more of a philosopher than even Mr. White himself, caring for nothing but to get under a cabbage leaf when it rained or the sun was too hot, and to bury himself alive before frost—a four-footed Diogenes, who carried his tub on his back.

Gilbert White was born at Selborne in 1720, and he died in the same little Hampshire village in 1793, in many ways still a child. His seventy-three years were passed without storm or stress, almost like one long, level day. He went to school at Basingstoke; took his degree at Oriel; was elected to a Fellowship in 1744; became curate at Swarraton, near Old Alresford, but apparently had little or nothing to do there; was Junior Proctor in 1752; possibly farmed in Cambridgeshire for a while; and in 1755 returned to Selborne to study nature and follow his own inclinations for the rest of his life. It is a mistake to suppose him vicar of Selborne: he may occasionally have taken a service there, but he was merely curate of Faringdon, an office which sat upon him very lightly. In 1763 he inherited the family home at Selborne, known as "The Wakes," and there the afternoon and evening of his life were spent. This house still stands, and we reproduce two of Mr. New's drawings of it. In this comely abode, the curious, patient, leisurely bachelor read the classics, examined his specimens, collated his impressions of the fauna and flora of the district, and wrote his famous book. Of the value of this work to science let Mr. Grant

Gilbert White's house

A corner of White's house

Allen speak. Says he, in his admirable Introduction to this edition :

We are present, as it were, at the birth of zoology ; we are admitted to see science in the making. Europe at that period was full of patient and honest observers like White, on whose basis the vast superstructures of Cuvier, Owen, and later of Darwin, were at last to be raised. But most of them are now, as individuals, forgotten, because they did not personally commit their work to print and paper, save in the transactions of learned societies. In White's Selborne, on the other hand, we have crystallised and preserved for us the very stages by which each plane of truth was slowly arrived at. We assist at the deliberations of the early biologists. We see them comparing and identifying species ; we find them fighting for or against some hoary but untenable tradition ; we note their eager love of truth, their burning desire for exact knowledge, their occasional reluctance to abandon some cherished fable which now seems to us too childish for such men's serious consideration. It is, therefore, as a historic document that the Natural History of Selborne most of all appeals to us ; it shows us by what steps science felt its way in the latter years of the eighteenth century.

It is late in the day to draw attention to Gilbert White's literary merits, but there are three passages which have always particularly pleased us. This description of the Sussex Downs is one :

For my part, I think there is somewhat peculiarly sweet and amusing in the shapely-figured aspect of chalk hills in preference to those of stone, which are rugged, broken, abrupt, and shapeless.

Perhaps I may be singular in my opinion, and not so happy as to convey to you the same idea ; but I never contemplate these mountains without thinking I perceive somewhat analogous to growth in their gentle swellings and smooth fungus-like protuberances, their fluted sides, and regular hollows and slopes, that carry at once the air of vegetative dilatation and expansion. Or, was there ever a time when these immense masses of calcareous matter were thrown into fermentation by some adventitious moisture, were raised and leavened into such shapes by some plastic power, and so made to swell and heave their broad backs into the sky, so much above the less animated clay of the wild below ?

Another is the few sentences that follow from one of White's many passages on the swallow, a bird which had always a singular fascination for him :

The swallow is a delicate songster, and in soft, sunny weather sings both perching and flying, on trees in a kind of concert, and on chimney-pots ; is also a bold flier, ranging to distant downs and commons even in windy weather, which the other species seem much to dislike ; nay, even frequenting exposed seaport towns, and making little excursions over the salt water. Horsemen on wide downs are often closely attended by a little party of swallows for miles together, which plays before and behind them, sweeping around, and collecting all the skulking insects that are roused by the trampling of the horses' feet.

And the third is the account of the acoustic tumult caused by the cannonading of Mr. White's friend—a kind of prosaic precursor of Joanna's laugh in Wordsworth :

My friend, who lives just beyond the top of the down, brought his three swivel guns to try them in my outlet, with their muzzles towards the Hanger, supposing that the report would have had a great effect ; but the experiment did not answer his expectation. He then removed them to the Alcove on the Hanger ; when the sound, rushing along the Lythe and Comb-wood, was very grand ; but it was at the Hermitage that the echoes and repercussions delighted the hearers : not only filling the Lythe with the roar, as if all the beeches were tearing up by the roots ; but turning to the left, they pervaded the vale above Comb-wood ponds ; and after a pause seemed to take up the crash again, and to extend round Harteley Hanger, and to die away at last among the coppices and coverts of Ward-le-ham.

But Gilbert White was not a great writer. He was more interested far in communicating facts than in rounding a period, although the hand of the conscious literary artificer now and then shows through. Thus, in an account of Sussex sheep, we read : "But as soon as you pass Beeding-hill, all the flocks at once become hornless, or, as they call them, poll-sheep ; and have, moreover, black faces, with a white tuft of wool on their foreheads, and speckled and spotted legs ; so that you would think that the flocks of Laban were pasturing on one side of the stream, and the variegated breed of his son-in-law, Jacob, were cantoned along the other." The end of that sentence must have given its author very considerable satisfaction.

Our own opinion has always been that Gilbert White's is one of the books which people talk about more than read. No one who knows anything of the books that are necessary to a literary gentleman's library would think of omitting The Natural History of Selborne from his shelves ; he would play with it now and then, and fondle it, and say, "Ah, yes, dear old White !" and see that Walton held a contiguous place ; but unless he were a naturalist himself he would not go through with it. We fancy that a census of the people who own White's Selborne and a census of the people who have read it would show vastly differing figures. Not that this matters very much, because there are certain books of which, after the merest glance, an intelligent person knows all, by a kind of instinct or sympathy ; and of these White's Selborne is one. To a true book-lover the spirit of a book may steal through its closed covers. Thus, one may understand Gilbert White perfectly on a very brief acquaintance. He is among the literary telepathists. In summing up his character Mr. Grant Allen applies to him a stanza from Mr. Dobson's "Gentlemen of the Old School":

He liked the well-wheel's creaking tongue,
He liked the thrush that stopped and sung,
He liked the drone of flies among
His netted peaches;
He liked to watch the sunlight fall
Athwart his ivied orchard wall;
Or pause to catch the cuckoo's call
Beyond the beeches.

"Such of a surety," says Mr. Grant Allen, "was Gilbert White's ideal; and we may almost add of him, in Mr. Dobson's apt phrase, 'His name was Leisure.'"

One word about Mr. Lane's edition. It impresses us as a great publishing feat. The editor was well chosen; the artist, Mr. Edmund H. New, was well chosen; and the inclusion of some new marginalia on White's Selborne by Coleridge, whose comments are much to the point, and of the bibliographical appendix, are of interest and value. The mechanical parts of the work are excellent too—printing, reproduction of illustrations, and binding. If the book has a fault, it is a fault of omission—the "Antiquities" are not here.

The Art of Description.

In India. By G. W. Steevens. (Blackwood. 6s.)

THE quality of Mr. Steevens's work—his vivid observation, his unflinching selection of the dramatic, his arresting imagery, his curt, saucy sentences—has been acknowledged so often in the ACADEMY that we can skip compliments and pass at once to this volume. In these brilliant impressions of a scamp through India we observe a development of Mr. Steevens's method which calls for a warning word. Again and again the adjective has mastered him. We hold that to the supreme artist in words, if there be such a person, nothing on earth is impossible of effective description—and by description we mean the power of handing on to the reader his thrills, his emotion, and his ecstasy. The art of doing this is incommunicable. It is rare, and Mr. Steevens does not lack it. If he fails sometimes in this book it is not because he has attempted the impossible in trying to picture the colour, the wonder, the magnificence of India, but because he has niggled when the brush work should have been broad and spacious. Superabundant epithets, colour piled upon colour, categorical details of beautiful things will not serve. That is not the way to communicate emotion. We judge Mr. Steevens by a high standard. If at times he has overstrained the art of word-painting, in other pages he shows all his old skill in conveying a picture. We will give examples of his failures and his successes. To begin, here is a failure:

The streets of Bombay are a tulip-garden of vermilion turbans and crimson, orange and flame colour, of men in blue and brown and emerald waistcoats, women in cherry-coloured satin drawers, or mantles, drawn from the head across the bosom to the hip, of blazing purple or green that shines like a grasshopper.

That is a catalogue. The picture does not start to the eye. It does not move us. Neither does this:

Blues soften from cobalt through peacock to indigo; turbans are no longer merely flaming red or yellow, but magenta, crimson, flame-colour, salmon-colour, gold, orange, lemon.

Again a catalogue. Here is another arrangement of words that has not been cajoled into life:

Gold cornices and scrolls and lattices frame traceries of mauve and pale green and soft azure.

The words do not live. Yet colours can become living things. Witness that wonderful passage in "Macbeth":

No; this my hand will rather
The multitudinous seas incarnadine,
Making the green—one red.

How the colours tell!

We should not have insisted upon Mr. Steevens's occasional failure to convey his impressions to the reader—a failure due not to carelessness, far from it, but rather to an over-anxiety to produce the full effect of what he saw and felt—had he not shown in other passages that the power to do so is particularly his. Here are some descriptions, vivid, yet calm, which are entirely successful:

The holy Ganges floated great and grey at my feet. Out of the blackness of the west it came naked into the muffled grey of dawn. Except the bare train that had brought me to the ghat and the bare steamer that was to carry me across, I could see nothing but chill yellow shore and sand-bank and chill white water. A pilgrim issuing from some little shrine, where he had slept, shivered and shook knee-deep in the stream, and his soaked white drawers clung to him dankly.

Here is a telling little picture of the effect of the irrigation works promoted by the Government, who have "bridled the river and brought it to the village gate":

Go out at evenfall and see the ryot naked to mid-thigh scraping entrances in his little embankment with his ante-diluvian hoe. First one, then another, rod by rod, till the whole field is soaked. Listen to the glug-glug of the water as the last compartment gets its douse, and look at the great peace on the ryot's face. You can almost hear his soul glug-glugging with the like satisfaction.

This, too, is good:

On the tongue of the valley stands Peshawur. It has stood sentry there ever since cities were, looking forward through the teeth of the hungry mountains, looking back to the gullet of the fat plains. The mountains are lean and swift and bloody; the plains are gorged and lazy and timid; the bases of the hills are the line between, and it is only one stride over it.

And, finally, this picture of "essential India":

About Madras, too, you can notice what in chattering Bengal and the fighting Punjab you are apt to miss. There, alone on the field, picking at the earth with a single careless hand on his plough, or standing, a lean, naked figure among the sleepy goats, you see the bed-rock of native India. The man who neither chatters nor fights, but does what the Brahman tells him, looks languidly to the land and the stock, and pays taxes. He is essential India.

We have dwelt rather on the manner than the matter of the volume. It is the reflection of a singularly acute and capable personality, and, in spite of lapses, emphatically a book to read.

For the foundation of style is nothing else but this: a fixed determination in any man to reveal the true nature of his thought as distinguished, and contra-distinguished, from the thoughts of all others his fellow-men, be they alive or dead. Not one of these shares fully the ideas that are man's; wherefore must he, at the beginning, be content to stand utterly alone in the world, until out of himself he can spin those threads which shall one day serve to swing him back into the thoughts of his kind. O awful isolation, awful incubation! O perilous flight through the void air!

Tha is the meaning of style.—C. F. KEARY.

Children's Books.—II.

By One Who Takes Them Seriously.

MR. BIRRELL's remarks at Edinburgh last week on how to tell a good book from a bad one were applied to books whose appeal is to the adult mind. According to the lecturer's first critic, Lord Rosebery, the test is a very difficult one to apply. With books ostensibly for children, however, one can come to a decision more quickly and with less difficulty. Is it dramatic? is one question that must be asked and answered of the letterpress. Is it about interesting things? Is it straightforward? are others. And that is almost all. While in the case of the illustrations, pictures with no story in them, pictures in which nothing happens, are little good, no matter what the skill of the artist; and, on the other hand, no matter how poor the artist, pictures of identifiable things belonging to child life or child imagination are almost certain to please. As a matter of fact, the author has a much harder task to perform than the artist. The artist, if he be an animal painter, for example, need modify no whit to catch the nursery suffrage, whereas the author, if he is to win it, must give much thought to both his matter and his manner. In other words, the artist can keep one eye on the adult with less risk than the author may. It is almost compulsory that the author should be whole-heartedly for the nursery if he is to succeed.

We have an instance of the failure of an author in the nursery, whatever may be his fate elsewhere, in Ulysses; or, De Rougement of Troy (Methuen), by A. H. M. This is a burlesque in rhyme of the adventures of Ulysses, and its appeal is to sharp public school boys rather than to anyone else. As its appearance is, however, that of a book ostensibly for children, it behoves one to mention it unfavourably here, in order that no hurried uncle or parent may be deceived and present it to a small child—to that child's disappointment. Here is, for instance, a very unsuitable stanza:

But here methinks I hear you say
"You take no count of time!"
To which I answer mildly that
This hunting for a rhyme,
As in th' original Odyssey,
Has played the very deuce with me.

While the author says of the suitor's treatment of Penelope:

They used to bet her two to one
That her old man was dead,
And then remark quite casually
That widows ought to wed—

which is the true manner of fifth-form burlesque.

Much more, but not wholly, to the point is Really and Truly (Arnold), by Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Ames, wherein both author and artist have had the adult a little too much in mind. The book purports to be a nursery guide to the most notable events of this century. One picture, for example, shows us a baker's window in which buns are priced at eighteenpence each, and loaves at from three-and-six to five shillings. The illustration refers to the Repeal of the Corn Tax, 1846, and the rhyme runs:

When the high price of bread
Could no longer be borne,
The Government took off
The duty on corn!

Now it is asking too much of any child to expect him to be interested in this. A picture of a cable under the ocean, with a curious assortment of fish adhering to it, is rather better, illustrating the first Atlantic cable, 1858, but the book is overweighted. Probably artist, author, and publisher are equally aware that this is not really and truly a children's book at all; and, in this case, why give it the nursery form? It is just a little unfair to the nursery.

For genuine entertainment the nursery would infinitely prefer the budget of old pictures and new which is contained between the covers of In Doors and Out (Blackie). Here the pictures are almost always well chosen. The letterpress might sometimes be better, but, take it for all in all, In Doors and Out is a good book with sterling nursery merits. So—at any rate as far as the pictures are concerned—is The Story of the Seven Young Goslings (Blackie), by Mr. Laurence Housman, with excellently-spirited and richly-coloured drawings by Mrs. Percy Dearmer. The child that is not pleased by a family of geese, that are nicely dressed and have amusing adventures, deserves to go without literature altogether. The story, which is in Ingoldsbyian rhyme, is, as it stands, less satisfactory; but, read aloud by a humorous father, it should be irresistible. Mrs. Dearmer's geese fulfil the condition laid down above in that they are always doing something. An instance of an animal draughtsman who comes short of this necessary quality is Mr. Carton Moore Park, whose Book of Birds (Blackie) fails as entertainment for children through being too artistic on the one hand and too inactive on the other. One has for Mr. Park both respect and admiration as a skilful artist; but his ingeniously-composed drawings will leave the nursery cold.

We find Mrs. Dearmer again in The Book of Penny Toys (Macmillan, 6s.), written and illustrated by herself. The letterpress, which is in rhyme, is, perhaps, rather more ingenious than interesting, but the simplicity and vividness of the pictures are all that children belonging to the age when penny toys are also joys can want. Mrs. Dearmer seems to try for two publics, one that reads and one that looks at pictures; indeed, we might say three publics, for the book is dedicated to Prof. York Powell.

A book for children about which there can be no doubt whatever is Tommy Smith's Animals (Methuen), by Mr. Edmund Selous. This is the story of a little boy named Tommy who threw stones at birds, and set his dog at rats, and stamped on beetles, and killed spiders, and did many other very natural and very cruel things. The animals, therefore, met to consider their hard case. One proposed one thing, one another, all being in favour of personal chastisement—except the owl. The owl advised reasoning, and for that purpose taught the animals human speech. The next day, therefore, just as Tommy was about to hit a frog with his stick, behold the frog addressed him very sensibly and interestingly, displayed its powers and characteristics, and finally extorted from Tommy a promise to maltreat frogs no more. The other creatures behaved similarly until in the end Tommy was reformed and considerate. It is conceivable that there are elephants and lions in Africa which wish that Mr. Selous's famous brother, Mr. F. C. Selous, had had Tommy's opportunities. But possibly the author would not have been on their side after all, for we observe that he permits slaughter to be dealt out to foxes and weasels, although it is probable that they could make as good a case for living as the rat does. The point is, that the work is well done, very interesting to a little boy, and a step in the right ethical direction.

Years ago the nurseries were tantalised or tickled by an alliterative alphabet from which nothing now remains in ordinary minds but the familiar symphony in P about Peter Piper. The alphabet begins: "Andrew Airpump asked his Auntie's Ailment," and continues on similarly absurd lines. This ancient and ingenious work has been discovered and illustrated by Mr. T. E. Donnison, and is now issued by Messrs. Duckworth under the title of Jaw-Cracking Jingles, making an amusing book.

This article must end with a word of unqualified dispraise of a book entitled Ruthless Rhymes for Heartless Homes (Arnold), by "Col. D. Streams," the humour of which is an inversion of ordinary feeling, by which a death is a joke and cruelty a pleasantry. Everything has been done to give the book a nursery appearance, or we should not object to it here.

Other New Books.

REMBRANDT VAN RIJN.

BY MALCOLM BELL.

Mr. Bell's book does not call for much criticism. It is not superfluous, because Rembrandt's genius will always bear to be celebrated anew. And it is celebrated very handsomely in this fine volume. Mr. Bell frankly says that he has no astounding discoveries or startling theories to promulgate. He tells the story of Rembrandt's life as it is known or conjectured in a safe, comprehensive way. We cannot do better than quote Mr. Bell's account of Rembrandt's failure to please his Amsterdam patrons with his great, his largest, and most famous work, "The Sortie of the Company of Francis Banning Cocq," known as "The Night-Watch":

Without exaggerating the rapidity or depth of Rembrandt's fall in popular estimation, it is certain that the picture in question was received with severe disapproval; nor is this reason far to seek. Holland at that time abounded in Guilds and Companies, civil and military, Boards of Management of this or that hospital or charitable institution, and a perfect craze for being painted in groups animated one and all. The galleries are full of these Doelen and Regent pictures by great and little masters, and dreary objects many of them are. Each member subscribed his share, and each expected to get his money's-worth. As Mr. Val Prinsep, R.A., in painting his great picture of an Indian durbar, encountered endless difficulties because precedence forbade that this Rajah should be larger than that Rajah, or this Prince in profile while that other Prince was in full face, so the Dutch painter was expected to distribute his light and his positions with an impartial hand, and a comically stiff and formal collection of effigies was often the result.

To all such considerations Rembrandt was gloriously indifferent. He was painting a picture and alive, not a mere row of wax figures in a booth; and when he had finished, the subscribers cried aloud in wrath and consternation. "It is all very well for Cocq and de Ruytenberg," they probably grumbled; "there they are out in the full light, right in front, easy to see and recognise; but look at me, or rather look for me, and you'll find me hard to discover, stuck away behind the folds of that great flag. Who wants a flag filling up half a picture? That didn't pay its hundred florins as I did."

We ought to add that Rembrandt as man, the painter, and etcher, are treated separately, and that Mr. Bell's descriptive catalogues of Rembrandt's works are a useful and scholarly feature. The illustrations, too, are admirable and numerous. (Bell & Sons. 25s.)

THE SCOTTISH JACOBITES.

BY THOMAS NEWBIGGING.

The Scottish Jacobite plots, risings, and songs are an eternal perplexity to many "general readers." This is a succinct narrative and commentary, dealing with the risings, from the flight of James II. in 1688 to the Battle of Culloden in 1746. It is a guide to the whole subject, and will be useful to some because it gives clues to scores of Mr. Andrew Lang's allusions. Mr. Newbigging shows why the Stuart cause found such devoted adherence in the Highlands, and he defends the Highlanders of the period from the insinuations and aspersions of Macaulay. A chapter on "Women and the Jacobite Movement" introduces the reader to Miss Carney of Craigs, to Flora MacIvor of Waverley, to Mrs. Mackintosh of Moy, to Flora Macdonald, and to Lady Nairne, who gave new and wistful life to Jacobite memories by her lovely songs. In the chapters on "Historians of the Jacobite Risings," "Modern Jacobites," "Their Songs," "Their Music," and "Their Battles," Mr. Newbigging acts as an intelligent and an impartial guide.

Of Macaulay's well-known attitude Mr. Newbigging says:

He had little ground for his diatribes. He wrote of the Highlanders as he might have done had he been in the thick of the hurly-burly and had experienced their vengeance. Standing at a distance from the events of the time, he had the opportunity of taking a broad and dispassionate survey. To his discredit, he preferred the opposite course. But when a theory (right or wrong) has to be buttressed, it is surprising to what lengths human nature will go, and to what depths it will descend.

It would seem that Macaulay deliberately engaged his admirers and his critics to support his fame. When his admirers slacken, his critics abuse his partiality, and then his friends exclaim, "But his style!" and so the game goes on.

Mr. Newbigging's chapter on the Jacobite songs is one of the best in his book. The humour, pathos, and irony of the songs are well displayed. None more pathetic than "There'll never be peace till Jamie comes hame," in which the old man laments:

My seven braw sons for Jamie drew sword,
And now I greet round their green beds in the yird;
It brak the sweet heart o' my faithfu' auld dame;
There'll never be peace till Jamie comes hame.
Now life is a burden that bows me down,
Sin' I tint my bairns, and he tint his crown;
But till my last moments my words are the same,
There'll never be peace till Jamie comes hame.

And many a fine deed—tersely narrated—shines in these modest pages:

According to a story that is told, it would appear that the exploit of the piper of Dargai in the recent Indian Frontier troubles was, after all, only the counterpart of that of another Highland piper who, in one of the engagements, when playing this tune, fell mortally wounded by a bullet, and being on the brae side, near a river, he rolled down the embankment clinging to his pipes, and skirling out the tune, till, falling dead into the water, he was carried away by the stream.

A tale of impossible loyalties drowned at last in its own martyr blood. Yet not so drowned but that it gives themes and colour to literature, and labyrinths to research. Even now there are Jacobites who place garlands and issue calendars. Mr. Newbigging's historical sympathy with the Jacobites who bled long ago leaves him sane on the eccentricities of their pigmy imitators. A sound little book, well illustrated and produced. (Gay & Bird. 3s. 6d.)

RURAL LIFE.

BY CAROLINE GEARY.

A pleasant pot pourri of observations and anecdotes relating to village life in England. Many of the stories are old, but they are well chosen and pleasantly knit together. There are stories of poachers, and parsons, and squires, and cottage women, and rustic courtships. Here is one of an absent-minded parson:

One Sunday morning, many years ago, some excitement prevailed in his church, when all were duly assembled for morning service, and no parson was forthcoming. The congregation waited and waited, every one looking more or less fidgety, until at length the churchwardens got up and left the church, having made up their minds to walk across the fields to the vicarage and ascertain if there was anything the matter. The vicar was a great numismatist and mineralogist; and although I cannot vouch for the truth of it, the story runs that when the churchwardens arrived they found him calmly looking over and rearranging his collection of coins and minerals, utterly oblivious of the fact that it was Sunday and church-time. It appeared that he had been staying in the country for a day or two, and had got rather mixed on the subject of dates; while his housekeeper happening to be away for a holiday, there had been no one who thought of reminding him of the church services. The poor man was quite startled by the visit of his churchwardens; but as soon as he was put in mind of his duties, rose up hastily to accomplish their fulfilment.

The rural district in which Mrs. Geary has collected her facts is only twenty miles from London, and is so little subject to changes that an old inhabitant remarked: "'Tis as 'tis, and it can't be no 'tisserer." (John Long. 6s.)

Fiction.

Miss Malevolent. (Greening & Co. 6s.)

OUR only excuse for taking special note of this work is that it is a peculiarly offensive example of a style of book which is rarely quite inoffensive. It has become the habit with a certain class of novelist, when his imagination fails and he feels nevertheless that he must write a book, to seize upon his friends and photograph them. Now, it is not easy to decide how far a writer is justified in taking real living people and "putting them into a book." The roman à clef is certainly not invariably to be condemned, or such delightful books as Mr. Mallock's New Republic would be lost. Thackeray continually drew the portraits of his acquaintances, and Warrington in Pendennis was painted from the life, the sitter being Mr. Crawford, the late husband of Mrs. Emily Crawford. Even in the present publishing season we have had from Mr. Morley Roberts a portrait of Mr. Cecil Rhodes in The Colossus. These we may commend, while Miss Malevolent fills us with abhorrence. In the word "portrait" lies the explanation, for a portrait, if it be worth anything, is the visual image of an individual which has passed through a mind, gaining significance in the process; and in looking at a great portrait we are thinking not so much of the individual sitter as at the significance that individual has gained in his passage through the artist's mind. Thus, to return for a moment to the New Republic, we are interested in Dr. Jenkins not so much because it is a recognisable portrait of Dr. Jowett, as because Dr. Jenkins—or Jowett—signifies one of the strongest intellectual currents of the time. The author of Miss Malevolent has given us not portraits, but exceedingly cheap photographs of the members of a small artistic and literary set with which he appears to have some acquaintance. The most distinguished member of the set is a poet with "a long, thin face, in which sensuality struggled with intellect, and it was crowned with an enormous mass of crinkled black hair." In order to leave no loophole for misunderstanding, the author adds a touch or two as to the poet's North-country accent and outspokenness on the question of sex, and dedicates the work, among others, to Mr. Le Gallienne. We have, too, Mr. World—as one should speak of Mr. Truth or Mr. Referee—and Mrs. Policarp, whose real name the author places—and mis-spells—on his dedicatory page. If these were portraits painted with insight and feeling by an artist, if they had any significance beyond the most petty externals of their originals, they might be tolerable. As it is, they are simply bad, botched, ill-developed, and unskilfully mounted photographs. Not for a moment does the author get beneath the surface. The reader may recognise the original. "Yes," he may cry, "his nose is just like that, and how big his feet come out!" And there the matter ends. Having told us enough of the exterior of his characters to enable us to recognise them, the author sets them over against each other, and compels them to make puns and kindred jests; he calls them epigrams.

"Please don't talk about swords" said Mr. World, "I can't bear it. Dreadful things! To point a quarrel or adorn a male."

Talking of Bedford Park, the painter Gilbert Russhe says:

"The strangest thing about it is that there is only one pub there, and even that is disguised as an old English inn; it is most respectable and is called the 'Tabard.'"

"That is no 'Criterion,'" said Mrs. Policarp.

None of them, not even the poet, rises above this pantomime level of wit:

"The gooseberry fool hath said in his heart, 'There is no Pod,' said Mr. Wayne, helping himself to some with great gusto and a small spoon."

The plot of the book is not worth discussing; it is silly where it is not offensive; and an all-pervading vulgarity is its distinguishing feature. The only sign of good taste on the part of the author is the omission of his own name from the title-page.

The Red Rag of Ritual. By George Cusack.
(Warne. 6s.)

It is unfortunate for Mr. Cusack that, having chosen a subject of considerable possibilities, he should not have been successful in acquainting himself more with the environment in which he has set his little drama. His book should be the study of two men who, respectively of epicurean and ascetic temperament find themselves thrown together in the parochial sphere of which a ritualistic church is the centre. It is clear that his acquaintance with the principles of that party in the Established Church is of a kind that it would be flattery to call superficial; and, as a natural consequence, an odour of unreality pervades his pages. The redeeming feature is Mrs. Crouch, among the minor characters, who, generally in the well-worn capacity of a Malaprop, wins an occasional smile. Here she is:

"Don't tell me," she said. "I don't trust Vicar one bit more than t'other. Make a friend of you; make a fool of you more likely. Mark my word, 'e's just as far gone as t'other, only 'e's cuter. Why, look at that 'ere insects last Sunday! Made my inside feel exactly as if I was on the Skylark; and as to the processions, when I see them coming towards me, I tell you, John, my hair rises, and cold creeps go down my back. Just like that night when a drunken man ran after me down our passage."

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THEY THAT WALK IN DARKNESS. BY I. ZANGWILL.

Eleven stories of modern Jewry, by the author of Children of the Ghetto. Mr. Zangwill's little book, Ghetto Tragedies, published in 1893, has been submerged in this larger work. The stories were written at various times—one as far back as 1888, another this year. Says the author: "The great-hearted lady, Mrs. N. S. Josephs, to whom Ghetto Tragedies was originally dedicated, herself walked in darkness, yet was not dismayed. In the prime of life she went down into the valley of the shadow with no thought save for others." (Heinemann. 6s.)

TALES OF SPACE AND TIME. BY H. G. WELLS.

Five stories of the past and the future, by the author of When the Sleeper Wakes. One is of a wonderful star that, coming nearer and nearer the earth, operated strangely and fearfully upon it. "China was lit glowing white; but over Japan and Java and all the islands of Eastern Asia the great star was a ball of dull red fire, because of the steam and smoke and ashes the volcanoes were spouting forth to salute its coming." (Harpers. 6s.)

NICHOLAS AND MARY. BY MURRAY GILCHRIST.

Mr. Gilchrist, who has now made the Peak country indubitably his own, has here collected fifteen stories of Derbyshire folk. The book is somewhat stern and grim, for Mr. Gilchrist's imagination prefers shadow to sun. Here is a scrap of dialect: "I rec'lect hoo liked green things—by marry! th' rose-o'-Sharon es i' flaar—hoo mun hev soome o' th' buds. Pu' 'em i' wayter overneeght, an' i' th' morn they're spread awt like goad suns." (Richards. 3s. 6d.)

THE INFATUATION OF THE COUNTESS. BY PERCY WHITE.

A bright, clever story, written in a true vein of comedy. The hero, Arthur Gammelyn, is a gentleman by birth who is compelled to earn his living as a fencing-master. His good looks and style infatuate the Countess of Redesdale, and awake a truer feeling in the heart of Connie Adair. The characters are well drawn. (Sands & Co. 6s.)

THE PROGRESS OF PAULINE

KESSLER.

BY FREDERIC CARREL.

An unedifying story by the author of The Adventures of John Johns. Says the hero to the heroine: "It's weak of me, I know, but I can't help thinking of the men who came before me in the happiness of loving you. I hate to think, somehow, that one of them was my own father, and that the other is your husband. I can't get rid of the haunting feeling of it." What delicacy! (John Long. 6s.)

THE POOR PLUTOCRATS.

BY MAURUS JÓKAI.

This is Mr. R. Nisbet Bain's translation of Jókai's most widely-known novel, Szegény Gazdagok. It is a tale of incident and adventure laid in the Wallachian and Transylvanian Alps, and contains some strong character-drawing. (Jarrold & Sons. 6s.)

A MAID OF THE MOOR.

BY M. E. STEVENSON.

Love among carriage-folk. "Lady Hartop had sent her carriage for the Prevosts. Wharton knew this, and was on the look-out for her livery while he walked under the row of limes between the churchyard and the cricket-field with Rose. Rose was in foamy white and silver, with a picture-hat of roses." When the lovers had walked in dramatic silence for a long time: "'Eustace!' she said suddenly. 'Yes?' 'That's aunt's livery, isn't it?' 'It is.'" (Pearson. 6s.)

THE PARSON'S DAUGHTER.

BY EMMA MARSHALL.

The late Mrs. Marshall conceived the pretty idea of writing a story "around" some of the portraits by Gainsborough and Romney in the National Gallery. Romney's "Parson's Daughter" gave the title to the book, which has been completed by her daughter, Miss Beatrice Marshall. Eight well-known Gainsboroughs and Romneys are reproduced. A pretty book. (Seeley & Co. 6s.)

A KISS FOR A KINGDOM.

BY BERNARD HAMILTON.

Mr. Hamilton is the author of The Light? but his new story, which he describes as a "venture in vanity," is a very different thing. "Wanted immediately, for a hazardous business, a gentleman of birth. Apply, Julius Cæsar, care of Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli, Paris." This advertisement is at the opening of Chapter I. Later we come upon this: "I called into the darkness in a stealthy, sibilant whisper. No answer. Then louder. No answer! I strained my eyes in the darkness of the cell, but could only see a firefly flitting about in it. I rattled at the bars. . . . She was not there." (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

A LOWLY LOVER.

BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

By the author of The House in the Marsh. "And they were married, and they were happy ever afterwards, though, in these despondent days, it hardly does to say so!" (White. 6s.)

THE GIRL PRIEST.

BY A. KEVILL DAVIES.

"'I'll tell you why I married you,' shrieked a flushed, emaciated, and hysterical young woman. . . . 'I married you because Dr. Philip M. . . . you in his prescription.'" That is the opening sentence. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

IN THE YEARS THAT CAME AFTER.

BY MRS. FRED REYNOLDS.

A serious story of sober lives and religious questionings. On the last page "the new day dawns." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

WOUNDED PRIDE.

BY ISABEL HOWARD.

A love-story in which the wayward conduct of a lover before marriage is resented by his wife when she discovers it. "To her it was evident that he had loved someone else, and that only a feeling of 'honour' towards herself had prompted him to marry her!" Hence "a wild flood of misery took possession of her whole being"; and yet "gratitude toward him filled every fibre of her being" for having given up "his own visions of love for the sake of a promise made years before by his father's death-bed." (John Long. 6s.)

JOHN AMES, NATIVE COMMISSIONER. BY BERTRAM MITFORD.

A story of the Matabele Rising which should share the present popularity of books about South Africa. Mr. Mitford knows his subject. (White. 6s.)

ANNIE O' THE BANKS O' DEE.

BY GORDON STABLES.

A love-story which moves from Scotland to cannibal regions and back again. It wasn't Reginald Graham who did the murder; it was Shufflin' Sandie. "The court even apologised . . . and wished him [Reggie] all the future joys that life could give"; and now Reginald and Annie are married, but the auld Laird has worn away, and is under the long green grass and the daisies, and rich and rare are the flowers that Annie lays on his grave. (White. 6s.)

THE SOLDIER AND THE LADY. BY JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

The author's recipe: "Take a soldier and a lady. See that both are fine, well-grown ones, and that they have been carefully fed mentally and physically. . . . Then take a rich lover, a pinch of moral cowardice, a little pride and an unexpected fortune. Let the whole simmer slowly for several years, and the result . . . but you must read the story." (White. 1s.)

FORD'S FOLLY, LTD.

BY MAJOR ARTHUR GRIFFITHS.

The story of the rehabilitation of a great estate and property. A well-planned story of crime, love, and wealth. (Macqueen. 6s.)

WINKLES: A WINNER.

BY "G. G."

The hero, Nick Flitters, is "wasting" for a race when we meet him. Nick Flitters is a jockey, and his immediate anxiety is to find Posh Jukes, his favourite companion, on a ten miles' "wasting" tramp. Nick does not "waste" by halves. As he says, he is nothing but skin and grief, and if he has a nip of gin it seems to expand him beyond recognition. (Sands & Co. 6s.)

THE ENCHANTER.

BY U. L. SILBERRAD.

A lengthy and circumstantial story of simple-minded East-Anglians and Nicholas Pycroft, who is esteemed a wizard among them. "'It ain't well,' Isaiah said hotly; 'if his mother wasn't a witch his aunt was; she was Judith Screed, a witch, as everyone knows, ask who you like. It's in the blood, I tell you; and here am I laid by the heels 'long o' his hell practices.'" The end is peace. (Macmillan. 6s.)

We have also received The Yellow Badge, a tale of crime, by Jean Middlemass (Digby, Long & Co., 6s.); The Drags of Wrath, a romance of the Restoration, introducing Charles II. and Nell Gwynne, by Walter E. Grogan (Pearson Ltd., 6s.); The Red Men of the Dusk, another romance of the Restoration, by John Finnemore (Pearson Ltd., 6s.); The Revenge of Valerie, a study of jealousy, by Hume Nisbet (F. V. White & Co., 3s. 6d.); Heavens of Brasse, by W. Scott King (Unicorn Press, 6s.), a moving tragedy laid in a Welsh mining district; The Manor Inn, by Dr. Dabbs (Deacon, 2s. 6d.); and My Great Discovery, by Henry Francis (Smithers, 2s. 6d. net).

Zola's New Novel.

(From our French Correspondent.)

It would be a pleasure to-day to be able to bestow unmeasured praise upon M. Zola's new book, Fécondité. But no. The novel is dull, verbose and antipathetic. It has, like every other book of M. Zola's, some very fine and impressive pages, and is, as ever, an extraordinary mingling of poetry and grossness. And throughout it shine the man's invincible sincerity and singleness of purpose, his passionate conviction; qualities that elsewhere we know have secured him a high place in the list of honest and courageous men. But in spite of our acquired sympathy, Fécondité is an effort and a trial to read.

It makes an admirable pendant to Tolstoi's Kreutzer Sonata, preaching, with a like conviction and fervour, an exactly opposite doctrine. All that Zola admires in marriage with extravagant passion, Tolstoi condemns; and while the latter degrades marriage with his ascetic contempt, Zola bestialises it with pagan devotion. I do not use the word "bestialise" in the conventional implication; I mean that Zola reduces man and woman to the mere state of animal: he eliminates mind and soul; heart with him is interpreted as health, while virtue is the continuous production of the species. For this new book of M. Zola's is eminently, pugnaciously virtuous, in his own strictly limited conception of the word. One would think he had striven to set himself the task of realising the patriarch's ideal of conduct in an empty desert which it was his duty to people. All other notion of conduct, of life, escapes him. M. Zola is undoubtedly a writer of remarkable, if not of sympathetic talent. He has given us admirable descriptions of nature, of Paris, of Rome. He can build up a scene with surprising vigour and verve—he sometimes reaches a grave and lofty eloquence—and however unclean he may be, he is never base or banal. We do not precisely envy his state of mind, or desire to see the world through his smoked glasses, for, heaven be thanked, life is always a more joyous, a more unexpected, a more simple thing than he believes. But we cannot deny that the writer, in his extravagant and mistaken realism, is superbly sincere, or that, when he stirs the mud and thickens it, he does so with a feeling of exasperated indignation. He is, I think, an unwise moralist, since he revels in black to reveal to us what is, after all, only a variety of very dull greys; but he is essentially a moralist, and Fécondité is an intolerable sermon on the vice of restricted families and the virtue of having dozens of children, in no less than 750 closely-printed pages.

The amazing thing to me is, how M. Zola has discovered so many French people, with whom his hero dwells in constant communion for seventy years (for Mathew and Marianne appear between seventeen and twenty, and bid us farewell at the respectable ages of ninety and eighty-seven), of whom never a witty or a brightly intelligent remark can he record. How is it that alone for M. Zola in France wit and humour are suppressed? Not the faintest ray of humour lights up a single one of these seven hundred and fifty pages. And how, one asks, has he succeeded, with such crushing power and deliberation, to paint us a race utterly devoid of soul or mind? Surely such a wife as Mme. Dreyfus has accomplished a loftier mission, by her suffering and solitude and fidelity, than Marianne with her soulless and incessant maternity? Marianne, he assures us with iteration, is the ideal of womanhood, and all he has to tell us of her is that she had fourteen children and was always good-humoured and courageous. When you reach the bottom of her courage, it is founded on an abominable indifference to the fate of the offspring that made her pride. To delight in the courage of a poor young couple who, in the teeth of national convention, resolve to have lots of children and trust to Providence to feed them, is, of course, the expression of a personal taste. We see how that sort of thing prospers in Ireland, where conventions are reversed, and huge families are the practised law of the land. M. Zola preaches his doctrine for the preservation of France. Yet France, with her small families, is wealthy, prosperous, active—at the head of Europe in every pleasing art. When Germany thought to ruin her, thanks to her domestic prudence, she could come forward with her millions, and pay off an overwhelming debt that would have beggared any other nation. Ireland, with her monster families, has never been able to feed her children, and what has she ever accomplished worthy of record? Irish women swarm the Continent in a helpless quest of daily bread by starving on ill-paid lessons. Their parents, who have never made the smallest effort to provide for them, cast them out upon the world in their teens, because there is not sustenance for them on Irish soil. I should dearly like to condemn M. Zola to a five years' study of the theme of his book in Ireland, and then see if he would still urge that the prosperity and salvation of a country lie in the direction he points out.

So much for the object of Fécondité, which I for one most utterly disapprove, and should regret to see exercise the smallest influence upon the bourgeois or working-classes of France. What is to be said of the novel? Are there readers who can follow with interest its incoherent construction? Are there any who will regard as probable or possible the distribution of compensation and chastisement M. Zola imagines? All the mothers and fathers of only children are pursued by an unmitigable destiny. Such evils and horrors happen to them as never happen to the worst criminals of melodrama. They have committed no actual crime, but their creator decides that they must be scourged because they have not baptized a child every year. In their behalf he introduces us to the most nauseous surgical homes and midwives' dens, and murders them with impunity. He kills off thus a beautiful young woman in an infamous surgical home, and a few years afterwards, not finding her and her husband sufficiently punished, sends her beautiful daughter, a young girl of twenty, to be despatched in the same way in another still viler surgical home, and records the fact in the same pages of high-flown prose, repeated without a word of description altered. A baroness who does not wish to have children (surely, considering the woman's character, a singularly virtuous resolution on her part), is depicted by M. Zola as quite a monster. She dies a raving lunatic for her sins. In fact, the novel is a monument of monomania. Long residence in France proves to me its absolute falsity. French homes are the happiest on earth, just because they are small, and the parents have space and time in which to love and care for their children. Girls are cherished and provided for, instead of being cast upon the pavements to pick up their bread as best they can. There are no mothers like French mothers, and I know no better wives. Why, then, does M. Zola persistently slander the women of his nation?

Fécondité may be described as a biblical novel. Every second chapter, which records a fresh addition to Marianne's family, ends with the same page, repeated word for word. Every chapter announcing the advent of another child begins with the same paragraph. The end introduces us to the entire family, after the fashion of Genesis: "Berthe was the daughter of Claire, who was the daughter of Rose, who was the daughter of Blaise, who was the son of Gervais, the son of Mathew and Marianne."

Things Seen.

The Thief.

He was a little, short-legged, grubby, meditative boy of eight. His father was a red-bearded, stern, silent man, who dug all the week, and on Sundays sat by the fire godly and disapproving. His mother was overworked in the daily task of keeping the house clean and feeding seven mouths. He was a good little boy until two bad ones moved into the village and joined the school, and then he began to be bad too. And a few weeks ago his wickedness culminated in a walnut raid. On the way back to the school is an orchard half full of walnut trees, and you may stand outside on a still October afternoon and listen to the nuts falling. There is no one to pick them up at the time, for the owner comes only at week ends. The two bad boys listened too, and, peering through the netting, they saw here and there a moist, clean nut which had sprung from its husk. They talked darkly together, and on Monday afternoon climbed gingerly through the barbed wire and filled their pockets. On Tuesday morning they told three others of their prowess and urged them to come too, the little, short-legged, grubby, meditative boy being one of them. That day for him was one long tremor. But after school, in the fading light, he crept with the others into the orchard. Finding too few nuts on the ground, they climbed a tree to shake more down. All climbed the same tree.

It so happened that a gardener had come over that afternoon to do a few odd jobs, and he heard a crackling noise in the orchard. He stole quietly down until he was under the tree. Then he called out. The boys' knees turned to water. "Now, then, you come down," he said. They trembled and refused. "Very well, then I must come up." He cut a stick from a filbert and made as if to climb. They came down, the little meditative boy first. The gardener held him and let the others run. They ran like rabbits. The gardener led him to the gate, his little heart beating in his neck. "Now then," he said, "tell me the names of the others and I'll let you go." He told them. The gardener wrote them down. "To-morrow morning," he said, "I shall send the policeman round to the school." The gardener walked away chuckling.

The little boy sidled home. He thought of his stern, silent father, but he thought of the policeman more. He couldn't eat, he couldn't sleep. The stifling thought of the policeman never left him. In the night he determined to run away. He had long wanted to be a fisherman on the Brighton beach and let out boats on hire: the hour had come to realise it. He woke his little brother and told him of his intention. He gave him all his marbles and swore him to secrecy. There was also a penny promised him by his grandmother. "Tell mother she may have that," he said. Then he slunk away.

He walked all day, starting at every noise on the road behind him. There was a big town seven miles away, although quite in the opposite direction to Brighton, and his little, short legs carried him there. But when he found that Brighton was another thirty miles he gave up his ambitions, gave up his fear of the police, gave up everything except home-sickness, and toiled back. All day long his mother had been running to the gate, for the story was out. Except the gardener, who lived some distance off and had not given the matter another thought, everyone knew that he had run away, and everyone knew why. The hours went by, he did not come, his mother's eyes grew more strained. Tea-time came and went; darkness fell; supper-time came, but no one wanted any supper; bed-time, but no one went to bed. And then, at eleven o'clock, the latch of the gate was heard, and a little, short-legged, weeping figure toiled up the path.

The other boys were thrashed handsomely by their fathers, and one was put on bread and water for three days. The village schoolmaster thrashed them too. When the owner of the orchard came down on Saturday he heard the whole story. "To think that our walnuts should have been harrowing all these souls," he said, "while we were comfortable in town. Why, I used to steal walnuts myself once."

The Piper.

It is not long since I used to see, on my hurried way to the City, a nimble but slouching figure walk down Waterlane playing imaginary tunes on a stopless pipe. Smiling, with an expression half foolish and half sly under his wideawake hat, he lured a grudging but inquisitive glance from rushing clerks. His eyes looked demurely down his black and dirty beard; he was tolerant of his audience of derisive brats. With me business grows ever fiercer, and the more I plough the sand the more I know I am getting on. Therefore I despised this humorous oaf. Only once had I seen him engaged in commerce. He was then hawking some illustrated monthly-parts, and had flattened one against a wall to write on it. So, knowing that he was making it harder to sell that part, I assumed he was a fool and passed on. I was about to sell myself in parts when next I saw him. Passing through Stationers' Hall-court one morning, my look suddenly dived into a doorway. He was seated impudently on the doorstep noiselessly playing his pipe. He had no sign of business about him; he was irresponsible and gay. There had I seen match-sellers lean and hungry, victims of chronic humility, self-deprecators, beggarly, wretched, loaded with babes. They were the sycophants of civilisation: this man was the mocker. Ah! at last I knew him. He was playing away there at me and those like me, to every respectable fritterer of life, in bitter parody of the tunes to which we danced. I did not speak to him. He was too great, and I was too shy.

The Amateur Critic.

[FROM time to time we receive letters from correspondents in praise or disapproval of books new and old. In future, for awhile, we propose to put a page of the ACADEMY at the service of the unprofessional critic. To this page we also invite our readers to contribute remarks on striking or curious passages which they may meet with in their ordinary reading. No communication, we would point out, must exceed 300 words.]

For an Anthology of Parody.

YOUR reviewer's interesting article on "English Satirists" brings it to my mind that there is, so far as I know, no concise anthology of parody, which, I imagine, is an art very nearly related to satire. In the hands of a careful editor such a book should bring to light much excellent stuff that is known at present only to limited circles. To show that a search in out-of-the-way places would be worth while I may quote an example by Mr. A. E. Housman. It is called a "Fragment of a Greek Tragedy" and was published in a college magazine. I select the strophe and antistrophe of the chorus.

Strophe.

In speculation
I would not willingly acquire a name
For ill-digested thought,
But, after pondering much,
To this conclusion I at length have come :—
Life is uncertain.
This truth I have written deep
In my reflective midriff
On tablets not of wax,
Nor with a pen did I inscribe it there
For many reasons: Life, I say, is not
A stranger to uncertainty.
Not from the flight of omen-yelling fowls
This fact did I discover,
Nor did the Delphic tripod bark it out,
Nor yet Dodona.
Its native ingenuity sufficed
My self-taught diaphragm.

Antistrophe.

Why should I mention
The Inachean daughter, loved of Zeus,
Her whom of old the gods,
More provident than kind,
Provided with four hoofs, two horns, one tail,
A gift not asked for,
And sent her forth to learn
The unfamiliar science
Of how to chew the cud?
She therefore, all about the Argive fields,
Went cropping pale green grass and nettle-tops,
Nor did they disagree with her.
But yet, howe'er nutritious, such repasts
I do not hanker after.
Never may Cypris for her throne select
My dappled liver!
Why should I mention Io? Why, indeed?
I have no notion why.

The Brontë Spell.

THE other week I read Wuthering Heights for the first time. I am still trying to discover why it fascinated me. Surely it is the most bleak and forbidding piece of literature, without one patch of pleasure in the whole stretch of it; yet it held me with a strange spell, and even now my thoughts wander back, again and again, to that grim hill-country, with its hob-goblin inhabitants.

The tale is after the make of the Northern Sagas; it passes inevitably from generation to generation of revenge; yet the characters have little of the heroic quality of the Sagamen, and are possessed of a host of petty meannesses quite alien to the temper of the big Northmen of old days.

Why, then, did these people seem perfectly real to me as I read? Why are they now more living men and women to me—of stronger sinew and redder blood—than most of my everyday acquaintances? Surely they are anything but natural: they are utterly abnormal; quite beyond the sympathy, one would think, of any lover of human nature. I have an active dislike for each person in the book, and yet I could read their ugly history again and again with unabated eagerness.

The people in Wuthering Heights are the very children of a desolate countryside. Their characters are warped and twisted as a heather sprig; they have been shaped by the same wind and the same poverty of sun. They are the natural outgrowth of a barren land; they are empty of good as the scanty soil from which they spring, and as relentless as the hard rock beneath. They are the personation of all that is gruesome and malign in nature's savage places, inspired with the primal and everlasting passions of mankind. To the Brontës it would seem to have been given to see more of the lurking beast than it is, happily, to most of us. Either their eyes were keener to pierce the silken cloak, or their lot fell among people who scorned to veil their native savagery.

But what is the secret of the Brontë spell? I am afraid we must use the old makeshift of calling it genius, without really getting any nearer to the core of the mystery.

"Eheu Fugaces."

"G. S.'s" contribution of a translation of the famous 14th Ode of Second Book of Horace tempts me to send you part of another version, which I think may not have seen the light in any modern selection of Horace. The version I send occurs in a volume entitled "The Poems of Horace," translated into English by several persons, and published with the 'imprimatur': Roger L'Estrange, September 10th, 1665."

Time Posthumus, goes with full sail,
Nor can thy honest heart avail
A furrow'd brow, old age at hand,
Or Death unconquer'd to withstand :
One long night
Shall hide this light
From all our sight,
And equal Death,
Shall few dayes hence, stop every breath.

In vain we bloody battles flie,
Or fear to sail when winds are high :
The Plague or an infectious breath,
When every hour brings a new Death,

Time will mowe,
Whate're we sow ;
Both weal and woe
Shall have an end,

And this th' unwilling Fates must send.

Cocytus lake thou must waft o're,
Thy totter'd boat shall reach that shore ;
Thou Sisyphus ere long must know,
And into new acquaintance grow :

Shalt with life,
Leave house and wife,
Thy loves and strife,
And have no tree,

But the sad Cypress follow thee.

Meanwhile, thy heir shall nobly quaffe
What thou with hundred locks kept safe,
Caceubian wines, and wash the flore
With juice would make an Emperor rore :

'Twill be thy lot,
Question it not,
To be forgot
With all thy deeds,

Er'e he puts on his Mourning weeds.

The Knowledge That Was.

The Confession of an Ignorant Man.

IN looking through some old letters the other day I came upon a bundle of examination papers belonging to the eighties, when I was at school. I had not seen them since that weary week when we sat in a cold public hall, some scores of us from various schools in the town, and either wrote against time or drummed on the desks until it seemed decent to go. And as I glanced over the questions it came back to me that, in most subjects, I was one of those who wrote against time and in the end passed with honours; and then, looking at the questions a little more narrowly, it also came upon me that there was hardly one which I could answer to-day, and I sank into a chair in a state of wonder, partly at the knowledge I possessed a dozen years ago, and partly at the ignorance which is mine now, when I am all these years older, and the father of a family, and a contributor to several papers of importance and influence.

A dozen years ago! I knew some things then! Arithmetic, for example. To-day I am at the mercy of any waiter who brings me change; at booking-offices I keep vast crowds waiting and missing their trains while I do laborious subtraction sums in my head; but at school what a hand I was at figures. Look at this:

Three graziers, A, B, and C, rent a piece of pasture land for a month. A puts on 27 cattle for 21 days, B 19 for 24 days, and C 23 for 25 days. If at the end of the month the rent and other charges amount to £33 5s. 10d., how much of this ought to be paid by each?

I could do that in 1884. I couldn't do it now. I have no idea where to begin. I could do this too; at least, I suppose I could, for I find a tick against it, and, as I have said, I passed with honours—

A merchant buys 700 quarters of wheat. He sells 280 of them at 7½ per cent. profit; 320 at 10 per cent. profit; and the rest at 22½ per cent. profit. His whole gains amount to £100 19s. 7d. At what price per quarter did he buy?

This may be easy, but the point is that I have lost the key. There used to be jugglery with x, and I could manage it. Now that I pay income-tax, and have statements of account from my publisher every half-year, I can manage it no longer.

And I seem to have known zoology too. Zoology! I seem to have been able to describe and draw diagrams of the heart and principal blood vessels of the crayfish. I seem to have been able to give an account of the circulation of the same creature's blood. I could enumerate the general characters of the Class Insecta (Hexapoda). And now—gone, all gone! Zoology is, however, a luxury; but geography—every journalist should know something of that. Yet I am to seek again.

Name the most populous county of Wales, the three largest towns in the county, and their special industries.

Whence come at the present time the world's chief supplies of coffee, ivory, petroleum, and tin?

Give approximately the parallels of latitude between which lie the basins of the Mississippi and the Nile respectively.

I know none of these things in 1899. There are several volumes of an Encyclopædia within reach as I write, there are geographies on my shelves; but the point is that once all this was in my head, and now it is there no more. Once—Great Heavens!—once I was a well-informed boy. To-day I don't see how I should pass the third-class College of Preceptors.

Grammar is hardly less formidable. I can write grammatically (with occasional lapses), I can detect grammatical errors, but I can no longer parse, I can no longer analyse, nor can I divide the auxiliary verbs into classes according to their uses, as once I could. Nor, in English History, can I discuss and contrast the Irish policies of Lord Strafford and Oliver Cromwell, nor explain how, in the Thirty Years' War, the foreign policy of King James I. differed from that of the House of Commons. And I no longer know when and between whom were fought the battles of Tenchebray and the First of June. Nor shall I now, except sporadically and for a fixed purpose, ever again acquire any fund of knowledge of most of these things. The time has gone by for storing my mind with orderly information; henceforward I have room only for the lessons of experience and such odds and ends of lore as are congenial and stick by virtue of that characteristic. I am an ignorant man, and I shall go down to the grave an ignorant man.

But what a clever fellow I was once!

P.S.—And yet I find myself wondering if it is possible to make a decent living at journalism and authorship without all this routine knowledge of the schools, why one should be bothered with it at all? Why not confine one's lessons to the classics, to modern languages and literatures, and to general history, and let the rest go? These are always useful; the rest are padding of which as much as one wants will come automatically. The fact that I have no need of zoology is sufficiently proved by the absolute blank in my mind where that branch of learning once dwelt. I am not an exceptional case. There are hundreds of journalists in my position who have similarly forgotten all these things, but who compensate for it as I do, and more than compensate for it, by the knowledge where to go for any needed fact. The art of using books, once acquired, is worth the best stored scholastic memory in the world. Thus I console myself.

And yet, what a clever beggar I was fifteen years ago.

Memoirs of the Moment.

MISS ANNA SWANWICK, in the usually tremulous years that reach from eighty to ninety, was still as precise, as "assured," as didactic as she was in her earlier decades. She came of a Dissenting fatherhood, and if the education she went to Germany to procure in four assiduous years gave her instruction rather than culture, the defect was one very common to some of the traditions of the time. She spent many years of her long life in translating German and Greek poets; yet poetry was the last adventure of which you would accuse her; and the translations themselves, however faithful to her scholarship, have just about the same place in English literature as might be accorded to the very proper notes she wrote asking you to luncheon or to afternoon tea.

A PARAGRAPHIST somewhere speaks of Miss Swanwick's drawing-room in Cumberland-terrace, Regent's Park, as the haunt of Tennyson, Browning, and Gladstone. Tennyson haunted no drawing-room, not even his own; and in London, for the last half of his life, he paid few visits and to few people. There was little in common between the Laureate and the lady: to whom, however, Browning was ready to pay homage, for was she not a woman as his wife was, and a lover and translator of Æschylus too? Mr. Gladstone had the same interest, and a story is told of him and her to illustrate, of all things, "his scrupulous care in dispensing public money." Struck with her scholarship, he asked her to breakfast, and finding her so intelligent, "decided that she would be a most fit recipient for a literary pension," if she were in need of one. But was she? He was meditating on the possibilities when Miss Swanwick asked him to dinner, and, driving to the South-West, he saw a ray of guiding light—"if there is champagne, no pension." And champagne there was. The story, coming presumably from Mr. George Russell must be credited. The initial difficulty is to believe that a harassed Minister would not wait for an application from the possible pensioner. But if his zeal so far outran his discretion, how whimsical was the test of suitability—of a piece, you might say, with any fatalistic superstition. A very needy woman writer might easily provide “champagne” for a Prime Minister on occasion; and spend less upon it, for that matter, than upon a bottle of sound claret. Well, let the episode remain; but not as one specially “characteristic of Mr. Gladstone’s scrupulous care in dispensing public money.”

In her house in Cumberland-terrace—which bore on all sides less arbitrary evidences of the “comfortable circumstances” of Miss Anna Swanwick—the present writer met one notability, at any rate—Prof. F. W. Newman, the “dear Frank” of John Henry Newman’s early verses; the brother to whom the Rev. John Henry Newman, before he was vicar of St. Mary-the-Virgin’s, Oxford, would not speak because of his ‘Liberalism’; the brother, again, who, in late life, visited the Oratory at Birmingham to greet the Cardinal, and, after the Cardinal’s death, wrote a book about him that had no brotherliness in it at all. Of those two brothers, it has been said that Fate took them up and threw one this way, the other that, making of one a Deist and of the other a son of the Church of Rome. A most strange figure was that presented by Frank Newman when, as a youngish man of eighty, he hovered round Miss Swanwick’s much-encumbered tea-table, erect, alert, with an Emersonian profile, and an aspect that seemed to combine an ancient Egyptian deity and a burlesqued Brother Jonathan. Even at the unemotional hour of five he was keen for controversy—of a rather rasping kind. “My brother refers his correspondents to his books for enlightenment: I send him mine, and he says he has no time to read them,” and he laughed the laugh of the author who believes that he has put forth the unanswerable. But Frank Newman was in a happier element when he gave days and days, as he did, to the elucidation of the text for the benefit of Miss Swanwick in her translation of the Dramas of Æschylus. Her knowledge of mathematics, too, she owed to Prof. F. W. Newman.

MISS SWANWICK, who had been obliged to abide in Berlin when a young woman in order to get her Greek and Hebrew, was almost agitated in her interest in the progress of higher education among women at home. In thought she was a sort of foster-mother to Girton and Somerville; her pride in the extension of University lectures to women in London was written on her forehead; and, now that she is dead, one remembers with regret that she was not painted by Mr. Shannon.

THE deaths of two clergymen, with names scarce known beyond the borders of the parishes of Romsey and Kirton, deserve from a larger public at least some passing remark. Romsey Abbey, under the charge of the Rev. Edward Lyon Berthon for over thirty years, was made, according to local report, “more Catholic” in its services; but this was not the only indication he gave of an approximation to the spirit of some of the ancient abbots who once ruled the place. Mr. Berthon was a man of many activities; and, when Popes boast of Pontifex Maximus as a title, the Anglican vicar need not give scandal as a builder of boats. There was the “Berthon collapsible boat,” used for saving life at sea and for taking troops across rivers. Portable hospitals he also made; and Berthon (like St. Paul) was a maker of tents. The Berthon Boat Works at Romsey had the inventive Vicar among their almost daily visitors; and to the list of the things he did design or discover might be added—such, at least, was his opinion—the screw-propeller, a model of which he offered in 1885 to the Admiralty, who rejected it with the message that it made “a pretty toy.” Happy inventor—happier, at any rate, than Francis Smith, who, five years later, launched his first screw steamship, to his own ruin.

THE other clergyman, the Rev. Herbert Plater, held his humble parish of Kirton, in Northamptonshire, by favour of the Duke of Newcastle. But he, too, had an outside interest—he was, first of all, a schoolmaster. A Post-mastership at Merton was followed first by a tutorship in Scotland, then by a Fellowship at Radley in its struggling days, then by a mastership at Marlborough, and afterwards by the head-mastership of Newark Grammar School. It was there that Plater showed himself a man of sense and spirit, taking in hand what other masters of less insight set down as “hopeless cases”—boys who were either too dull or too mischievous to keep quite in line with the crowd. Thus it was that he had among his pupils—that he gave to the army—Bromhead of Rorke’s Drift; and this was an achievement that added to the happiness—the word is well-advised—of “the Master,” to use his local appellation at Newark, for there was praise in its simplicity.

SIR JOHN MILLAIS was a man of most excellent manners, who never allowed his delightful frankness to cross the border into bluntness, still less into discourtesy. With some incredulity, therefore, will his friends read the story—told in his biography, and quoted in many newspaper notices as if it were particularly characteristic—about his addressing Cardinal Newman as “you dear old boy.” “Evidently the two men were intimate,” says one commentary. But they were not. The venerable Cardinal, then at the end of his long life, had climbed the marble stairs at Palace Gate not without difficulty, and saw the painter for the first time when he came to him, by the arrangement of common friends, as a sitter. The familiarity of the phrase would, under the circumstances, be quite foreign to the delightfully free yet deferential speech and bearing of Millais. It so happened, that the present writer had from the painter at the time some account of the sitting. He owned that he had astonished the Cardinal. But how? By announcing with a directness at once recognisable as proper to him: “What a beautiful complexion you have, Mr. (sic) Cardinal; I declare you’ve the complexion of a child.”

Correspondence.

A Pair of Parallels.

SIR,—In last week’s Literary Competition, “M. I.” selected, as a specimen of terse and telling prose, a passage from Mr. Henry James’s What Maisie Knew. No doubt “M. I.” also thought of the curiously parallel passage in The Newcomes, but rejected it as being too familiar and hackneyed. May I quote it, just to show the close identity of theme?

Those pretty old walks and bastions, under the pleasant trees which shadow them, and the grey old gabled houses from which you look down upon the gay new city, and the busy port, and the piers stretching into the shining sea. . . . There are few prospects more charming than the familiar view from those old French walls—few places where children may play, and ruminating old age repose more pleasantly than those peaceful rampart gardens.

Mr. Henry James’s scrap of description has its own charm, but it lacks the smiling melancholy of the elder author, and perhaps Thackeray would not have liked old women who “knitted or snoozed” in a picture of this sort. That Mr. Kipling’s steamers should “gratefully grunt” in the passage which finally won the prize is right enough. A deliberately grotesque picture demands other colours than a sunny landscape.

In winning the prize, the quotation from Mr. Kipling ran neck and neck with another familiar passage from Thackeray. This brings me to my second parallel by a curious train of association. I, too, was a competitor, and my original choice was the very passage which nearly won the prize for Miss Lucas. Even now, I think I prefer the "darkness which came down on the city and the field" on the night of Waterloo to the bellowing of that brazen bull. But I rejected my scrap of Thackeray, partly for the reason which, I imagine, led "M. I." to prefer Mr. Henry James, partly because there are, just now, only too many Amelias praying for Georges who are fighting far away.

My second choice was a bit of soldier's prose—a scrap from Sir George Colley's account of the retreat from the Ingogo. It is not surprising that my extract did not win the prize, or even the compliment of quotation. Where William Morris and Maurice Hewlett, Stevenson and Stevens, Meredith and Hardy, Ruskin and Carlyle, Chambers and Vincent Brown were wanting, an extract from a hurried official despatch could only succeed as an interesting case of terse vigour due to circumstance and the pressure of events. Just as, to quote last week's ACADEMY, "for all practical purposes, such despatches as Sir George White's models of good writing are enough."

But perhaps a better fate would have befallen another extract from Sir George Colley, my second parallel, suggested in its turn by Mr. Bond's quotation from Many Inventions. We all know Mr. Kipling's "Disturber of Traffic." It might have been derived from Lieut. Colley's account of the Straits of Sunda, seen by him on his way to the China War. Here is a scrap from it:

The sun strikes down with a deadly vertical glare, under which the decks of the ship blister, and even the water seems to swelter and putrefy and has an unpleasant smell. As the ship glides through it, it seems to give way heavily, and closes in at once without a ripple. In perfect unison with the scene was the melancholy wreck of a ship, aground on a mud-bank, and the half-putrid body of a sailor which floated past the ship. Slimy snakes the only living things to be seen—the whole scene so dreary, oh, so dreary!

Only a rough entry in a soldier's diary, but almost as vivid and "convincing," to use the cant critical phrase, as Mr. Kipling's carefully collected and poised words.—I am, &c., J. D. A.

[This is the passage from What Maisie Knew, with which our correspondent compares Thackeray:

Best of all was to continue to creep up the long Grand Rue to the gate of the haute ville, and, passing beneath it, mount to the quaint and crooked rampart, with its rows of trees, its quiet corners and friendly benches where old women in such white frilled caps and such long gold earrings sat and knitted or snoozed.]

"The Place of Morocco in Fiction."

SIR,—The quotation in your current issue from the chapter on this subject in my Moorish Empire does injustice to a brother of the craft which I am sure was unintentional. My description of The Scapegoat as "the only Moroccan novel worth reading" must be read from my standpoint, already defined elsewhere (p. 519) as seeking for "fiction which conveys reliable conceptions . . . of the conditions of life in the land of the Moors." On the page quoted from (527), in reviewing Mr. A. J. Dawson's ingenious and entertaining Bismillah—which I described as "the second of the only two novels which make a serious attempt to depict Moorish life . . . in which, with tesserae more often true than false, an incorrect effect is produced"—I was careful to remark that "nevertheless, Bismillah deserves more praise than the narrow limits of the standard by which it is here judged permit it to claim . . . for it is well designed and well told." It is, therefore, certainly worth reading by ordinary readers.

Perhaps you will also permit me to welcome a new-comer in this field, although I have not yet seen it. In another section of my own work (p. 464) I spoke of the clever and accurate sketches of life in Morocco published in local journals over the signature of "Madge Mortimer," by Mr. R. L. N. Johnston, of Mogador, as "worth preserving in a less fugitive form." Their announcement as a volume entitled At the Sign of the Palm Tree promises pleasure and profit to a large circle of readers.

At the same time I take occasion to point out that the companion volumes to The Moorish Empire—The Moors, and The Land of the Moors—are not yet issued, as inferred in your review, but are still in the publisher's hands, and will only be due in January and April next.—I am &c.,

Misconceptions.

SIR,—I remember, as a small child, learning a certain comprehensive hymn on the Creation, and being thoroughly puzzled by the following lines:

Soon as the evening shades prevail
The moon takes up her wondrous tale.

I longed to know, but dared not ask, what sort of a tail it was, how the moon took it up, and, above all, where it was at the present time.

I was also considerably mystified by a line in Julius Caesar:

Mischief, thou art afoot.

Why, I wondered, should mischief be called a foot any more than a leg or an arm or other member of the body?

I agree with your correspondent, Mr. Tabb, that no language, however simple, can escape a child's perversion. But such misconceptions, even were they avoidable, do no permanent harm; and it seems to me a great pity if, in deference to the modern craze for simplifying all teaching to the level of the dullest understanding, we cease to utilise the precious "parrot" memory of childhood for the storing up of a knowledge of classical English, both prose and verse.—I am, &c., ELEANOR TAYLOR.

Settrington: October 29, 1899.

The Gaudy Manner.

SIR,—Are we to condemn every phrase that expresses nonsense when the middle is left out? An arch may be well built and yet fall when the keystone is removed. "E. H." does not say why we may safely leave out adjectives in testing grammar. I presume his argument is that an adjective is no more than an appendage to a noun and has no structural connexion with the rest of the sentence. If so, "brother" is not used as an adjective in the phrase "his brother President." Apparently, "E. H." felt this, for he gives two conflicting renderings, "his President" and "his brother." "Brother" cannot be left out like an ordinary adjective, for it has a double hold on the sentence. In our thought, a President can stand alone, but a brother President is necessarily linked to some other President. The link is correctly expressed by a common use of the possessive pronoun, in which it denotes not ordinary possession, but relation—as when we say "his predecessors," "his superiors," "his colleagues." ("E. H." does not really hold the opinion suggested by his reasoning, that Lord Salisbury's colleagues are his property.)

Burns sings "gently scan your brother man," and emphatically tells the Mouse that he is its fellow mortal. I give these instances merely to show that "the typical error of this week" is not peculiar to a "gaudy manner," which doubtless ought to be condemned, though not for its simple and correct idioms.—I am, &c., T. A. B.

Our Prize Competitions.

Result of No. 7 (New Series).

THE response to No. 7 has been of record magnitude. We asked for pictorial passages, not exceeding eight lines in length, from English poets. The best choice is the following from "King Lear":—

The crows and choughs that wing the midway air
Show scarce so gross as beetles; half way down
Hangs one that gathers samphire, dreadful trade!
Methinks he seems no bigger than his head:
The fishermen that walk upon the beach
Appear like mice; and yond tall anchoring bark
Diminish'd to her cock [her cock, a buoy
Almost too small for sight]; the murmuring surge
That on the unnumber'd idle pebbles chafes Cannot be heard so high.

sent in by Mr. R. Narayanan, 44, Park-street, Cambridge, to whom a cheque for a guinea has been posted. We are surprised that Mr. Narayanan should alone have lighted upon this wonderful scene.

A selection of other examples is given below, some of the best, such as Mrs. Browning's description of England, being placed first. A census of all the replies shows that Tennyson's works lead by a large number as the favourite hunting-ground. Then come Browning's, and then Keats's. Where an asterisk is placed against the quotations that follow, it signifies that more competitors than one have chosen that piece.

... Hedgerows all alive
With birds and gnats and large white butterflies
Which look as if the may-flower had caught life
And palpitated forth upon the wind,—
Hills, vales, woods, netted in a silver mist,
Farms, granges, doubled up among the hills,
And cattle grazing in the watered vales,
And cottage-chimneys smoking from the woods,
And cottage-gardens smelling everywhere,
Confused with smell of orchards. . . .

A host of golden daffodils;
Beside the lake, beneath the trees,
Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.
Continuous as the stars that shine
And twinkle on the milky way,
They stretched in never-ending line
Along the margin of a bay.

I stood at Naples once, a night so dark
I could have scarce conjectured there was earth
Anywhere, sky or sea or world at all:
But the night's black was burst through by a blaze—
Thunder struck blow on blow, earth groaned and bore,
Through her whole length of mountain visible:
There lay the city thick and plain with spires,
And like a ghost disshrouded white the sea.

There at the window stood,
Framed in its black square length with lamp in hand,
Pompilia; the same great, grave, grievous air
As stands i' the dusk on altar that I know,
Left alone with one moonbeam in her cell
Our Lady of all the Sorrows. Ere I knelt, Assured myself that she was flesh and blood,
She had looked one look and vanished.

The sunrise broken into scarlet shafts
Among the palms and ferns and precipices;
The blaze upon the waters to the east;
The blaze upon his island overhead;
The blaze upon the waters to the west;
Then the great stars that globed themselves in Heaven,
The hollower-bellowing ocean, and again
The scarlet shafts of sunrise—but no sail.

The sentinel on Whitehall Gate looked forth into the night
And saw, o'erhanging Richmond Hill, the streak of blood-red light.
Then bugle's note and cannon's roar the death-like silence broke,
And with one start, and with one cry, the royal city woke.

At once, on all her stately gates, arose the answering fires;
At once the wild alarm clashed from all her reeling spires;
From all the batteries of the Tower pealed loud the voice of fear,
And all the thousand masts of Thames sent back a louder cheer.

The sea is calm to-night.

Crown'd with the minster-towers.

Competition No. 8 (New Series).

The conversation at a certain house the other evening turned upon the amount of significance which some poets—notably Shakespeare—have crowded into a single line. One speaker instanced :

Child Rowland to the dark tower came, from King Lear ; but that line is mysterious and romantic rather than surcharged with matter. A better example is in the porter's speech in Macbeth, where he says : "I had thought to let in some of the old professions, that go the primrose way to the everlasting bonfire." This, properly speaking, is prose ; but it illustrates our point. We offer, then, a prize of a guinea for that line chosen from English poets, living or dead, which is most packed with meaning.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, November 14. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the second column of p. 552 or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given : we cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

CHRISTIAN MYSTICISM. BY WILLIAM RALPH INGE.

When the Rev. John Bampton, Canon of Salisbury, left funds for the preaching of eight divinity sermons annually at St. Mary's, Oxford, he laid down six subjects upon one or another of which the whole series of Lectures should be given. Mr. Inge has chosen the first: "How to Confirm and Establish the Christian Faith." "No word in our language," he remarks, "not even 'Socialism,' has been employed more loosely than 'Mysticism.'" (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

RUBENS: HIS LIFE, HIS WORK, &amp;C. BY EMILE MICHEL.

This work is translated by Elizabeth Lee, and in outward appearance and internal qualities it is a companion to Michel's Life and Work of Rembrandt. The illustrations are numerous, and they reflect by their various sizes and medium the exceedingly varied work of the artist. There are also portraits of Rubens' masters, his pupils, and friends. M. Michel has given long and laborious study to his subject. Indeed, he says: "I have lived almost exclusively with Rubens for several years; with the help of his pictures, his correspondence, and that of his relatives and friends, and of all the documents concerning him, I have endeavoured to penetrate his mind and heart, to learn his opinions, beliefs, character, manners, and the method in which he employed his time." (Heinemann. 42s.)

STUDY AND STAGE. BY WILLIAM ARCHER.

Into this book Mr. Archer has collected such of his critical writings of the past year as he deems may have "more than an absolutely ephemeral interest." He pleads, with justice, that it may be "no bad thing for a critic here and there to bring with him to the theatre some of the standards of the study, and to carry back to the study some of that rapidity of perception and penetration which is, or ought to be, engendered by the habit of making snapshot records of the passing pageant of the stage." (Richards. 5s.)

FRAMES OF MIND. BY A. B. WALKLEY.

Literary and dramatic criticism in neat, allusive essays. Some are grouped under "The Playhouse," others under "The Bookshelf," "Men and Women," &c. These papers are reprinted from the Daily Chronicle, the Speaker, &c. (Richards.)

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. BY L. COPE CORNFORD.

This is the second volume in Messrs. Blackwood & Sons' new series of "Modern English Writers." Mr. Cornford is careful to define the limits of his work, which is "a study of his finished achievement, and of his personality and temperament as expressed in that achievement." Of course, Mr. Cornford has made no use of the letters which have appeared in Scribner's Magazine. (Blackwood & Sons. 2s. 6d.)

HOW ENGLAND SAVED EUROPE. BY W. H. FITCHETT.

By his Deeds that Won the Empire and Fights for the Flag Mr. Fitchett has established himself as our popular powder-and-shot historian. He now sets out to tell the story of the Twenty Years' War: "a resounding epic rather than a drab-coloured page of pallid and slow-moving history; an Iliad of battles, sieges, and invasions." (Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

THE HITHERTO UNIDENTIFIED CONTRIBUTIONS OF THACKERAY TO "PUNCH." BY M. H. SPIELMAN.

A book interesting to the student of Thackerayan minutiae. Mr. Spielman's finds are literary and artistic; he produces about a score of poems not hitherto ascribed to Thackeray, or included in his collected works. The various contributions have been identified from an old Punch day-book of contributions. (Harpers. 7s. 6d.)

A NEW NOVEL BY FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT.

READY END OF NOVEMBER.

IN CONNECTION WITH THE DE WILLOUGHBY CLAIM.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

In the above work, which promises to be the longest and most important Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett has produced for years, the authoress, in the setting forth of a very novel plot, has drawn her principal characters with even more than her old charm of delineation and pathetic description. Tragedy and comedy are well represented, and some important theological questions are strongly presented in a way that is likely to evoke discussion.

TWO LITTLE PILGRIMS' PROGRESS: a Story of the City Beautiful. With 12 Original Illustrations by R. W. Macbeth, A.R.A.

"Two Little Pilgrims' Progress" is Mrs. Burnett at her very best; with that wondrous gift she possesses of enchanting her readers by dealing with some great mainspring of human interest, she leads them, by means of the delightful little character-studies she has given to the world, to the consideration of some of those great aims which both young and old must learn; and she does it with a delicacy of handling and with a tact so charming that one can only lay down the volume with the feeling that one has been given something, and cordially re-echo the truth contained in the last sentence—

"Nature never made a human hand without putting into it something to give."

Price 3s. 6d. each.

In small medium 8vo, cloth gilt.

LITTLE LORD FAUNTLE- ROY. By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT. With 26 Original Illustrations from Designs by Reginald B. Birch.

THE CAPTAIN'S YOUNGEST,
PIOCINO; and other Stories. By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT. With 16 Illustrations.

Court Journal.

LITTLE ST. ELIZABETH,
and other Stories. By FRANCES
HODGSON BURNETT. With Original
Illustrations by Reginald B. Birch, Alice Havers, and Alfred Brennan.

"All the world knows 'Little Lord Fauntleroy' as told by Mrs. Burnett. In the present volume we have an equally quaint and charming heroine."—Queen.

Happened at Miss Minchin's; and
EDITHA'S BURGLAR. By FRANCES
HODGSON BURNETT. With Original

"With its blending of simple pathos and childish humour with the quaint term of expression and the genial reflection of a gifted child, the book will please many people more than 'Little Lord Fauntleroy.'"

THE "LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE."

"A great undertaking."—THE ACADEMY.

Edited by Dr. RICHARD GARNETT, C.B., Late Keeper of Printed Books at the British Museum.

ISSUED BY
The Standard.

10,000 Royal Octavo Pages. 500 Full-Page Illustrations and Coloured Plates. A Thousand of the World's Masterpieces.

(The Entire Work is in English.)

TWENTY HANDSOME VOLUMES, COMPRISING THE GREAT LITERATURE OF ALL TIMES.

THE COMPLETE WORK DELIVERED ON THE PRELIMINARY PAYMENT OF HALF-A-GUINEA.

A GREAT OPPORTUNITY.

The issue by The Standard of THE LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE, on the same plan of monthly payments that proved so successful with The Times issue of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," promises to meet with an extraordinary success. The advance-of-publication orders for this unique Library have already reached a remarkable figure. The Library is offered at special introductory prices equivalent to a 50 per cent. from the regular prices. These prices will be advanced as soon as the Library is ready for delivery, but meanwhile The Standard's offer presents an attractive opportunity to secure at once, upon the preliminary payment of but half a guinea, the complete set of twenty large volumes. The latter contain 10,000 royal octavo pages, and comprise a thousand masterpieces of the world's literature, from the dawn of letters to the best work of living authors; enough reading, in truth, for a lifetime.

A HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED PROSPECTUS.

If you will state where you read this notice, The Standard will send post paid to any address a large illustrated Prospectus of the LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE, together with specimen pages, from the index, and the like. But those who prefer to file their subscriptions at once, and thus take advantage of the Special Prices, which are offered in advance of the day of publication, may examine the work in the different styles of binding, at The Standard Office, 23, St. Bride Street, near Ludgate Circus; at "MITCHELL'S" ROYAL SUBSCRIPTION LIBRARY, 33, Old Bond Street, W.; at the CIVIL SERVICE STORES, 28, Haymarket; and at the JUNIOR ARMY AND NAVY STORES, Waterloo Place, where Orders may be booked, both for Cash Payments and on Monthly Instalments.

EDITED BY DR. RICHARD GARNETT, C.B.

THE LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE is Edited by Dr. Richard Garnett, C.B., who has just retired from his post as Keeper of Printed Books at the British Museum after half a century of service. Many of the most eminent men of letters have collaborated in the production of the Library, and have written for it a brilliant series of original essays. The work is richly embellished with 500 apposite illustrations and rare coloured plates, printed separately from the text on heavy enamelled paper. It is arranged in chronological order, and aside from providing an endless store of the most interesting reading, affords a fascinating view of letters in every age and in every clime. It is a new and original work, and in mere extent is equalled only by great books of reference like the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

WHAT THIS GREAT WORK IS.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to attempt to convey an adequate idea of so great a work. It is much like endeavouring to give a friend an idea of a vast exposition, such as, for example, that which will be held in Paris next year, by sending him a few extracts from the catalogue. The LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE is precisely what its title indicates—a huge treasury of the finest and most interesting pieces of literature, from the dawn of civilisation down to and including the authors of our own day—that is to say, from the old Babylonian story of Istar and the quaint Egyptian tale of Two Brothers, the most ancient pieces of literature extant, to the best work of living writers, like Tolstoi, Hardy, Swinburne, Mark Twain, or Kipling. It contains everything: the great classics like the Iliad and the Odyssey; wonderful stories like the great Bharata Tale (the Mahabharata of the Ancient Hindoos); poetry and stories from every people who ever lived and sang; the best of history, from writers like Mommsen and Curtius, Freeman and Froude, Gibbon and Green; bits of adventure and stories of wild life; the pith of the great philosophers like Hobbes and Locke and Hume and Spencer; fascinating chapters of science from writers like Huxley and Darwin and Proctor; famous letters from famous writers of letters; oratorical masterpieces from Demosthenes and Cicero to John Bright and Gladstone; choice pages from the intimate thoughts of diarists like Amiel and Samuel Peeps; epigrams and maxims from men like La Rochefoucauld and Dean Swift; philosophical reflections from writers like Rousseau and Pascal; religious writings like those of Cardinal Newman, Thomas à Kempis, and Dean Farrar; biting sarcasm from a Heine or an Ibsen; pathos and humour from writers like Charles Lamb, Bret Harte, or Oliver Wendell Holmes; fables from La Fontaine; autobiographies like Benjamin Franklin's; in fine, the whole gamut of literary production, from grave to gay, from the deepest questions that concern the human soul to the lightest jests of a Horace, a Sterne, a Rabelais, or a Max O'Rell.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Those who subscribe now, in advance of Publication, may obtain the Complete Work, Twenty Volumes, at a Reduction of 50 per cent. from the regular prices. The entire Twenty Volumes will be sent, all at one time, upon a preliminary payment of but Half a Guinea; further payments, after the twenty volumes are in your hands, to be at the rate of 9, 12, 15, or 21 shillings per month, according to the binding.

If you wish to receive a Prospectus cut this slip out, or carefully give the name of the paper in which you read this notice.

JARROLD &amp; SONS' NEW LIST.

MAURUS JÓKAI'S NEW NOVEL

"The greatest living master of romantic fiction."—St. James's Gazette.

THE POOR PLUTOCRATS. 6s.

By MAURUS JÓKAI. Translated by R. NISBET BAIN. With Photogravure.

"The Poor Plutocrats" is one of its author's best-known works in his own country, while well-reputed Danish, Dutch, Polish, and German translations testify to its popularity on the Continent. It is essentially a tale of incident and adventure, but its characterisation is unquestionably its strongest point, and among its characters are some of the most finished and original portraits that the great Hungarian has given us, while throughout the vivid descriptions of mountain scenery are in the author's most characteristic vein.

A FAMOUS ROMANCE OF THE LIFE OF MOZART.

THE TONE KING. 6s.

A Romance of the Life of Mozart.

By HERIBERT RAU. Translated by J. E. ST. QUENTIN RAE. With fine Photogravure after Jäger's Portrait of Mozart.

"The Tone King" tells with charming sympathy the life story of Mozart, and, together with the same author's romances on the lives of Beethoven and Weber, has almost attained the position of a classic. The three romances were recently referred to in the German Publishers' Circular as "forming together a complete cycle of incomparable pictures of the life and works of our three greatest musicians." Besides its interest to musical amateurs, the book is notable for its descriptions of Continental scenery and the pretty pictures of eighteenth-century social life.

CYRANO DE BERGERAC.

CAPTAIN SATAN. 6s.

Adventures of Cyrano de Bergerac.

By LOUIS GALLE.

Captain Satan forms a romance d'aventure of a most exciting character, with the renowned Cyrano de Bergerac and his "heroic" nose for Nero. Throughout the work we are brought closely in contact with Cyrano, and a vivid picture of the famous swashbuckler-poet is given. Apart, however, from this special interest, the book may well rely on its intrinsic merits, and the stirring and breathless incidents which rapidly succeed one another maintain the reader's interest at a high pitch of excitement.

EXPLORATIO EVANGELICA:

A Brief Examination of the Basis and Origin of Christian Belief.

By PERCY GARDNER, Litt.D.

This is an investigation, by a layman, of the facts, both psychological and historical, of the Christian origins. It is in three books. The first deals with the psychology of religious belief in individuals and in societies. The second examines the documents of early Christianity, and the character of the history of the Founder and His Apostles. The third traces the rise of Christian doctrine in the century after the Crucifixion, showing its basis in experience as interpreted by the mind of the age.

The Literary Week.

ON December 9 we shall issue a Special Double Number of the ACADEMY, which will contain, besides the regular reviews, articles, &c., the following features: A statement with reference to our award of One Hundred Guineas and Fifty Guineas to authors; "1899: a Retrospect"—being a complete review of the literature of 1899; critical examinations of "Some Younger Reputations."

MR. THOMAS HARDY's poem in last week's Graphic was one of the very few pieces yet inspired by the war which has been worthy of its author. Mr. Hardy, with his unerring instincts for the tragic and pitiful in life, chose his theme well: the emotions of the women assembled to bid farewell to a departing troopship. The poem, moreover, has the great merit of being cast in a musical metre. Mr. Meredith has also contributed something to the situation in the shape of a sonnet in the Daily Chronicle, entitled "At the Close." It has a vivid line:

Now is it red artillery and white steel;
but the meaning does not leap to the mind of the ordinary man.

THIS is Mr. Hardy's poem, which we reprint by kind permission of himself and of the Graphic:

THE GOING OF THE BATTERY.

[November 2, 1899. Late at night, in rain and in darkness, the 73rd Battery, R.F.A., left Dorchester Barracks for the War in South Africa, marching on foot to the railway station, where their guns were already entrained.]

Wives' Voices:

Rain came down drenchingly; but we unblenchingly
Trudged on beside them through mirk and through mire,
They stepping steadily—only too readily!—
Scarce as if stepping brought parting-time nigher.
Great guns were gleaming there—living things seeming th re—
Cloaked in their tar-cloths, uposed to the night:
Wheels wet and yellow from axle to fellow,
Throats blank of sound, but prophetic to sight.
Lamplight all drearly blinking and blearily
Lit our pale faces outstretched for one kiss,
While we stood prest to them, with a last quest to them
Not to court perils that honour could miss.
Some one said, "Nevermore will they come! Evermore
Are they now lost to us!" O, it was wrong!
Howsoe'er hard their ways, some Hand will guard their ways—
Bear them through safely—in brief time or long.
Yet—voices haunting us, daunting us, taunting us,
Hint in the night-time, when life-beats are low,
Other and graver things. . . . Hold we to braver things—
Wait we—in trust—what Time's fulness shall show.

A CONTEMPORARY makes some mystery of a box of letters and papers which was left to the British Museum in 1834 by Francis Douce, and was not to be opened for sixty-six years. This period expires next year, when the box will be opened. Of course, there is nothing unusual in such a circumstance, and, as a matter of fact, four or five long-sealed collections of papers are to be unlocked in the British Museum at the same time. Even where the testators do not stipulate for such delay the Trustees of the British Museum frequently lock up papers until living people to whom their contents might give pain or offence have passed away. It is not probable, therefore, that there will be a torchlight procession to the Douce box in the early hours of January 1 next.

FRANCIS DOUCE's box is said to contain his private letters and commonplace books. These will doubtless prove interesting, but it is not likely that they can compare in importance with the collection of books and manuscripts which he bequeathed to the Bodleian Library. That the Bodleian should have obtained these valuable gifts is the more extraordinary, because Douce was an official of the British Museum—in fact, Keeper of the Manuscripts. He nursed, however, some fancied grievance against the Trustees, and on a visit to the Bodleian he was received with such excessive blandness by the then librarian (who probably held the doctrine that politeness is one of the cheapest and most profitable of investments) that the antiquarian never recovered his balance, and left his finest manuscripts to the Oxford institution.

PROF. JAMES WARD's treatment, in his Naturalism and Agnosticism, of Mr. Herbert Spencer's philosophy was recently discussed in our columns. A more authoritative criticism of Prof. Ward is now to appear in the shape of an article by Mr. Spencer himself in the December Fortnightly Review. Mr. Spencer is not easily stirred to reply; but when he is the results are interesting.

THE publishers of the British Weekly have made arrangements to sell Tissot's Life of Christ, the ordinary price of which is twelve guineas, for eight pounds and six pounds (according to binding) on the instalment system.

MRS. MEYNELL's anthology, The Flower of the Mind, is now available in a pocket edition in Mr. Grant Richards's "Breviary" series. As is well known, Mrs. Meynell excludes Gray's "Elegy" from her collection. Oddly enough, the "Elegy" is this week issued as the first volume in a series of poetic booklets issued by Mr. John Lane under the title of "Flowers of Parnassus." Thus the poem which Mrs. Meynell condemns to waste its sweetness on the desert air of mediocrity is given a garden of its own on the slopes of the Muses' hill.

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS's new novel, Robert Orange, the promised sequel to The School for Saints, will be published as a serial in the Ladies' Field. The first instalment will appear in the Christmas Number.

MR. C. G. D. ROBERTS, the Canadian novelist, has finished a romance entitled The Heart of the Ancient Wood,

THE picture of Cunzie House, East Anstruther, which we reproduce, will be of interest to all students of R. L. Stevenson, for it was there that he lived during the summer of 1868, while assistant engineer at the harbour works. At this place (under the title of 'Kenzie House') was written some of the earliest of the correspondence included in the edition of The Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson which we notice elsewhere this week. Cunzie House may be easily recognised by visitors to East Anstruther, from the fact that a tablet has been recently erected upon it.

"FIRST catch your Boer, then kick him," wrote Pudd'n-head Wilson in Mark Twain's More Tramps Abroad, and the sentiment ought to send many readers to that diverting and very able book. But once there some may be disappointed, for Mark Twain has always been in the habit of looking at both sides of a case. Still not even his lack of admiration for the administration of Rhodesia could excite his sympathy for our enemies. In describing some Boers who got into the train on one of his journeys, he says: "A gaunt, shakely, country lout, six feet high, in battered gray slouched hat with wide brim, and old resin-coloured breeches, had on a hideous brand new woollen coat which was imitation tiger skin—wavy broad stripes of dazzling yellow and deep brown. I thought he ought to be hanged, and asked the station-master if it could be arranged." The station-master, however, was annoyed "and did everything he could to turn public sentiment against me. It is what one gets for trying to do good."

MARK TWAIN'S elaborate calculations, based on the last Boer war and the Jameson Raid, as to the number of Englishmen and guns and rounds of ammunition necessary to kill one Boer have happily been falsified by recent events. This is part of the argument:

Let us now examine history, and see what it teaches. In the four battles fought in 1881 and the two fought by Jameson, the British loss in killed, wounded and prisoners, was substantially 1,300 men; the Boer loss, as far as is ascertainable, was about 30 men. These figures show that there was a defect somewhere. It was not in the absence of courage. I think it lay in the absence of discretion. The Briton should have done one thing or the other: discarded British methods and fought the Boer with Boer methods—or augmented his own force until—using British methods it should be large enough to equalise results with the Boer.

To retain the British method requires certain things, determinable by arithmetic. If, for argument's sake, we allow that the aggregate of 1,716 British soldiers engaged in the four early battles was opposed by the same aggregate of Boers, we have this result: the British loss of 700 and the Boer loss of 23 argues that in order to equalise results in future battles you must make the British force 30 times as strong as the Boer force. Mr. Garrett shows that the Boer force immediately opposed to Jameson was 2,000, and that there were 6,000 more on hand by the evening of the second day. Arithmetic shows that in order to make himself the equal of the 8,000 Boers, Jameson should have had 240,000 men, whereas he merely had 530 boys. From a military point of view, backed by the facts of history, I conceive that Jameson's military judgment was at fault.

FINALLY, says Mark Twain:

If I could get the management of one of those campaigns, I would know what to do, for I have studied the Boer. He values the Bible above every other thing. The most delicious edible in South Africa is "biltong." You will have seen it mentioned in Olive Schreiner's books. It is what our plainsmen call "jerked beef." It is the Boer's main stand-by. He has a passion for it, and he is right.

If I had the command of the campaign I would go with rifles only, no cumbersome Maxims and cannons to spoil good rocks with. I would move surreptitiously by night to a point about a quarter of a mile from the Boer camp, and there I would build up a pyramid of biltong and Bibles fifty feet high, and then conceal my men all about. In the morning the Boers would send spies, and then the rest would come with a rush. I would surround them, and they would have to fight my men on equal terms, in the open. There wouldn't be any Amajuba results.

ANOTHER American humorist has also discussed the situation—Mr. Dooley. We take the following from Harper's Weekly:

"An' what's it all about?" demanded Mr. Hennessey. "I can't make head nor tail iv it at all, at all."

"Well, ye see, 'tis this way," said Mr. Dooley. "Ye see, th' Boers is a simple, pasthral people that goes about their business in their own way, raisin' hell with ivybody. They was bor-rn with an aversion to society, an' whin th' English come they lit out before thim, not likin' their looks. Th' English kept comin' an' the Boers kept movin', till they cudden move anny further without bumpin' into Kitchener's ar-rmy, an' thin they settled down an' says they, 'This far shall we go,' says they, bein' a religious people, 'an' divle th' sthep further.' An' they killed off th' irreligious naygurs an' started in f'r to raise cattle. An' at night they'd set outside iv their dorps—which, Hinnessy, is Dutch f'r two-story brick house an' lot—an' sip their la-ager an' swap horses an' match texts fr'm th' Bible f'r th' seegars, while th' childher played marbles with di'mon's as big as th' end iv ye'er thumb."

"Well, th' English heerd they was goold be th' bucket in ivry cellar fr'm Ooopencoff to Doozledorf—which, Hinnessy, is like New York an' San Francisco, bein' th' exthreme p'int in th' country—an' they come on in gr-reat hordes, sturdy Anglo-Saxons fr'm Saxony—the Einsteins and Heidlebacks an' Werners; an' whin they'd took out goold enough so's they needed raycreation, they wanted to vote. 'An', says Joe Chamberlain, he says, 'be hivins, they shall vote,' he says."

As to President Kruger himself, Mr. Dooley is unrestrained. This is his joyous estimate:

"Kruger, that's th' main guy iv th' Dutch, a fine man, Hinnessy, that looks like Casey's goat an' has manny iv th' same peculyarities."

THE prize poems in praise of the independent agriculturist which a wealthy American asked for by way of counterblast to "The Man with the Hoe" have not yet been printed; but here and there in American papers replies to the original poem are still being printed. In the Nebraska State Journal "The Man Who Keeps no Hoe" is pleasantly touched off. This is the note of it:

When spring-time comes he takes his foaming steeds,
All proud and champing in their harness gay;
Begins his yearly war against the weeds,
And while the sun shines makes his wad of hay;
But not a second does he fool with hoe,
Nor any back-number agricultural implement such as a
Markham used to know.

He turns the furrow with a sulky plow,
Nor does he walk, but sits upon a seat,
The sweat of labour is not on his brow,
There are no bunions on his manly feet;
Serene and calm he sits and drives his team,
And smokes cigars, and sends the hired man to the house for ice cream.

We give a portrait of John Everett Millais, taken in 1854, and included in the splendidly illustrated biography which we reviewed last week. As a young man Millais is said to have borne a close resemblance to Lord Leighton, though, of course, in stature there was a great difference between the two friends. Millais stood just over six feet, and was proud of his height. Mr. John Guille Millais tells us that Millais would say to his sons: "If any of you boys show signs of being taller than your father, I'll punch his head."

JOHN EVERETT MILLAIS.

ONE would not naturally look to an amateur tennis champion for a new translation of the Sermon on the Mount; although there is no reason why one should not, except our insular prejudice against a man doing two dissimilar things well. But Mr. Eustace H. Miles, who defeated Sir Edward Grey last summer in the game of kings, is the author of an interesting little work entitled The Teaching of Jesus To-day, in which he offers the fifth chapter of Matthew in a new rendering, the attempt being to convey not so much what Jesus said to the Jews of long ago, but what He might say to us now. These are the Beatitudes in Mr. Miles's treatment:

Happy are those who have lost all selfish thoughts: God's unseen world is for them alone.

Happy are those who feel unselfish sorrow: they alone will be comforted and spurred on.

Happy are those who are gentle: they alone will have everything left to them.

Happy are those who feel a hunger and thirst for what is right: they alone will be satisfied.

Happy are those who feel pity and are kind: they alone will receive pity and kindness.

Happy are those whose thoughts are spotless: they alone will see God.

Happy are those who bring peace: they alone will be known as God's own children.

Happy are those who are made to suffer for doing what is right: God's unseen world is for them alone; you yourselves, if you are working on my side, should be happy when you are abused and made to suffer, and when all kinds of untrue things are said about you: you should be glad and triumphant, for ample is your recompense in the unseen world; this is how they made God's representatives suffer before your time.

Mr. Miles explains the phrase "God's unseen world": "Not a golden and jewelled heaven far away, where we shall sing and feed and rest when we are dead; but it can begin here, it can be entered while we are still alive, and it is a world of active work. In God's unseen world are none but the unselfish, the unselfishly sorrowing, the gentle, the kind, the pure—in fact, none but those whom Jesus called 'happy.' No one of these qualities is enough—sorrow by itself is not enough; indeed, if any one link in the chain is missing, you cannot be actually living in God's unseen world."

THE GOSPEL OF PEACE IN KHAKI.

[An Oxford India-paper Bible, bound in khaki, and weighing only four ounces, has been prepared by the Oxford University Press Warehouse for our soldiers and sailors at the War.]

O THOU Who from Thy Heaven above
Control'st this little star's unrest,
And latterly hast come to love,
We know, the English race the best,
Help us forget, till war is done,
That Little Englander, Thy Son.

We thank Thee that Thy Holy Writ
Is so adaptable a guide
That none need go away from it
With any doubt unsatisfied—
For every course some sanction is,
If not in John, in Genesis.

Yet this we ask in mood profound:
Direct our Tommies when they con
Thy Book of Books, in khaki bound,
(Which also cheers the Boers on)
Lest any foe be left alive,
Keep them from Matthew chapter five.

MESSRS. BLACKWOOD will publish in the course of November an anthology of Prayers from the Poets, compiled and edited by Mr. Laurie Magnus and Mr. Cecil Headlam, author of the The Story of Nuremberg, and other works. The volume is arranged in the form of a calendar of devotion, with one or more poems to each day in the year, and special dates in British annals are marked by appropriate pieces. The editors, who contribute about twenty original translations to their volume, have drawn from all times and countries for the purposes of the anthology. They have further been enabled to include poetical prayers still in copyright by the Dean of Ely, the Poet Laureate, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Mr. W. E. Henley, Mr. Robert Bridges, Sir Lewis Morris, Mrs. Meynell, and others.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "While turning over Thoreau's Walden this afternoon with an eye to descriptive passages of 'Things Seen' and simply told, I came upon many places where Thoreau describes things heard in the silence of the woods; might I make the suggestion that your series of 'Things Seen' might be supplemented by a series of 'Things Heard'? The following, taken almost at random, will serve as a specimen of Thoreau's power of audible description; he is telling of the railway sounds which penetrated to his retreat:

All day the fire-steed flies over the country, stopping only that his master may rest, and I am awakened by his tramp and defiant snort at midnight when in some remote glen in the woods, he fronts the elements encased in ice and snow.

And again:

As it grew darker I was startled by the honking of the geese flying low over the woods, like weary travellers getting in late from southern lakes, and indulging at last in unrestrained complaint and mutual consolation. Standing at my door, I could hear the rush of their wings; when driving toward my house they suddenly spied my light, and with hushed clamour wheeled and settled in the pond.

As an example of dramatic effect, lovers of Treasure Island will not need to be reminded of that most paralysing of sounds—the approaching thud of the arch-villain's wooden leg! The following stanza of Rossetti's is the happy result of the poet's imaginative power in describing the Unseen and Unheard:

The sun was gone now; the curl'd moon
Was like a little feather
Fluttering far down the gulf; and now
She spoke through the still weather.
Her voice was like the voice the stars
Had when they sang together.

All these effects are nocturnes; it would be interesting to find others heard in broad daylight, when light and colour are all but paramount."

MR. F. R. BENSON'S season at the Lyceum, beginning on February 15, 1900, is to offer to some extent a foretaste of the workings of a municipal theatre. The performances will be devoted almost solely to Shakespeare, and a large committee has been formed to interest people in the experiment and guarantee its success, or, at any rate, go far towards doing so. The programme arranged is as follows:

1st week, beginning Feb. 15...	"Henry V."
2nd " " Feb. 22...	"A Midsummer Night's Dream."
3rd " " Mar. 1	"Hamlet" and "The
4th " " Mar. 8	Rivals" (alternately).
5th " " Mar. 15...	"Richard II."
6th " " Mar. 22...	"Twelfth Night."
7th " " Mar. 29...	"Antony and Cleo- patra."
8th " " April 6...	"The Tempest."

Arrangements are made by which season tickets entitling the holder to one performance of each play are to be obtainable.

Bibliographical.

Does anyone want a translation into English of Voltaire's "La Pucelle d'Orléans"? The question is one which "The Lutetian Society" will soon be in a position to answer, for it has arranged for the issue of such a version, of which Mr. Ernest Dowson will be the author. It will be in verse, like the original, each line of which will have, I gather, its English counterpart. The first five cantos of "La Pucelle" appeared in English in 1785, but the first version which approached completeness was that (ascribed to Lady Charleville) which was privately printed at Dublin in 1796-7. Of this, however, only fifty copies were circulated; while the translation undertaken by W. H. Ireland, and published in 1822, was suppressed as far as it could be. It will be understood, therefore, that copies of the versions both of 1796-7 and of 1822 are very much in demand among collectors. Mr. Dowson's version, we are led to expect, will be unexpurgated, and will also include translations of the variants on the cantos. Mr. Dowson seems to be busy as a translator, for he promises us versions of the memoirs of the Duc de Richelieu and of Cardinal Dubois. More than that, he is soon to follow up his volume of Verses with another, which he entitles Decorations.

When announcement was first made of a book described as Reminiscences of Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, &c., by the late Mrs. Lynn Linton, I ventured to suggest that this might be found to consist merely of a few slim articles contributed by Mrs. Linton to a magazine some little time ago. My suggestion proves to be well-founded. The book has come out, and, in an "Introduction" eight lines long, Dr. Robertson Nicoll says: "These papers were written for a periodical at my request." Why not mention the periodical and the dates of publication? Why add unnecessarily to the labours of the bibliographer? The little book, I may add, is notable for its very frank comment upon Thornton Hunt and George Henry Lewes.

The name of Hain Friswell is, apparently, still one to conjure with, for I see advertisement made of a new book from his pen entitled Some of Life's Problems. A biography of Mr. Friswell, you will remember, was published not so very long ago. He appealed powerfully to the middle classes in their hours of ease, and his place in that respect is now unfilled, "A. K. H. B." being no longer with us. There is room for an essayist who will deal with the things of every day from the point of view of the lay preacher—there are in this country so many readers who enjoy being mildly lectured on the minor morals.

There is also life, apparently, in Harrison Ainsworth, much as he is pooh-poohed by the elect. We are to have all his historical romances anew in a set of twenty uniformly got-up volumes. Of late years his works have been issued principally by Messrs. Routledge, with an occasional look-in on the part of Messrs. Warne, Mr. Walter Scott, Mr. R. E. King, and Mr. Dicks. It is the fashion with some to sneer at Ainsworth, but I fancy his Crichton, his Guy Fawkes, his Jack Sheppard, his Lancashire Witches, his Rookwood, his Tower of London, and perhaps others, will live some time longer.

Yet another edition of The Story of an African Farm! If I remember rightly, that story appeared originally sixteen years ago in two volumes, and at the modest price of twenty-one shillings. Then, between 1883 and 1889, came editions at five shillings, two shillings, eighteenpence, and one shilling. In 1891 there was a three-and-sixpenny edition. In the same year there came Dreams, followed in 1893 by Dream Life and Real Life, and in 1897 by Trooper Peter Halket. Obviously, however, it is on the African Farm that Olive Schreiner's reputation will be based.

Mr. Murray announces a "second edition" of Axel Munthe's Letters from a Mourning City, "a personal account" of the plague-days in Naples in 1884. This was brought out by Mr. Murray in 1887. It will now re-appear in the shape of an entirely new translation, for which the author is responsible. Practically, therefore, it will be a new production.

Mrs. Roy Devereux, who is to give us some Sidelights on South Africa is the author of The Ascent of Woman, published three years ago. She has made, I believe, one experiment as a writer for the stage. At least, I have heard ascribed to her a little, but striking, one-act piece called Beyond, produced at the Criterion one afternoon in 1894.

The Real Stevenson.

Letters to His Family and Friends. By Robert Louis Stevenson. 2 vols. (Methuen. 25s.)

"WELL, I did my damdest anyway." This sentence, from his own pen, might stand as Stevenson's epitaph. If ever a man did his best, he did. He put his best into his books, he gave of his best to his friends. His correspondence alone would make a full life's work for many a man. The character of the letters varies widely, because he always wrote to his correspondent. The quality of his delightful egoism, his gaiety, the depths of his gloom, the range of his reflections, suit themselves to the mind he is addressing at the moment. In these letters Stevenson stands revealed—his fantasy, his moods, his joy in life, his passion for expression, his sincerity, his sympathy, his wilfulness, and that seriousness, deep-lying and persistent, which was the core of him.

Addressed to his family and his friends, the letters date from the age of eighteen till his death. The recipients have lent them lavishly for this collection, which Mr. Colvin has edited admirably. Indeed, so well has Mr. Colvin performed his task, so sufficient are his biographical notes, that we could almost say the supplementary volume of his Life that is to follow, from the pen of Stevenson's kinsman, Mr. Graham Balfour will be superfluous. The man is here. It is himself who speaks, as if he were alive. His words have wings.

The difficulty of reviewing or appreciating such a book is the difficulty of selection. Hardly a page but has something which calls for quotation or comment. Much must be left unnoticed even in our attempt to produce, in the broadest brush-work, the real Stevenson as we see him, who lurked clear-eyed beneath the kaleidoscopic flashings of his frolic moods.

His life was a search for health, or rather for such health as would allow him to work. Neither climate nor illness dulled his fancy nor hindered his passion for self-expression. At Bournemouth, during one period, he worked vigorously upon no fewer than ten books. The conditions were these:

During all the time of Stevenson's residence at Bournemouth [says Mr. Colvin] he was compelled to lead the life, irksome to him above all men, but borne with invincible sweetness and patience, of a chronic invalid, and almost constant presence in the house. A great part of his time had perforce to be spent in bed, and there almost all his literary work was produced. Often for days, and sometimes for whole weeks together, he was forbidden to speak aloud, and compelled to carry on conversation with his family and friends in whispers or with the help of pencil and paper.

Whatever Stevenson's personal sufferings might be, he determined that they should not influence his work. There was enough sorrow and gloom in the world without adding to it. Literature should hearten, not depress.

As I live [he writes to Mr. Dick] I feel more and more that literature should be cheerful and brave-spirited, even if it cannot be made beautiful and pious and heroic. We wish it to be a green place. The Waverley Novels are better to re-read than the over-true life [the Life of Scott], fine as dear Sir Walter made it. The Bible in most parts is a cheerful book; it is our little piping theologies, tracts, and sermons that are dull and dowie; and even the Shorter Catechism, which is scarcely a work of consolation, opens with the best and shortest and completest sermon ever written—upon man's chief end.

Stevenson kept this aim steadily before him. His stories are objective—never influenced by his moods. The ebb and flow of his spirit, his doubts, his joys, his anxieties—himself—are to be found only in his letters and, in a lesser degree, in certain of his essays. To intimate he wrote without restraint and with extraordinary facility and prodigality. How easily the following story trips!—so few authors would have "wasted" it upon a letter. It seems that in early days, in Paris, Stevenson's chivalrous feelings had been shocked by a scene in the Demi-Monde of Dumas fils. Mr. Archer, his correspondent, had asked what exactly took place:

It happened thus. I came forth from that performance in a breathing heat of indignation. On my way down the Français stairs I trod on an old gentleman's toes, whereupon, with that suavity that so well becomes me, I turned about to apologise, and on the instant, repenting me of that intention, stopped the apology midway, and added something in French to this effect: "No, you are one of the lâches who have been applauding the piece. I retract my apology." Said the old Frenchman, laying his hand on my arm, and with a smile that was truly heavenly in temperance, irony, good-nature, and knowledge of the world: "Ah, monsieur, vous êtes bien jeune."

As we have already said, the character of the letters varies to suit his correspondents. Those to his father can only be described as paternal; Mr. Henley is the comrade with whom he has fought shoulder to shoulder—now separated; Mr. Colvin is the elder friend; Mr. Charles Baxter is the companion of his youth, the friend of many memories; and so on through the whole range. His correspondent of the moment is always before him, and the impulse, the emotion of the moment, runs into the letter of the moment, so different from the stern self-repression of his novels. It relieved him to utter these cries, to be the child again, to be timid, to be petulant, to be sad, to be gay, and his friends gave great welcome to these confidences.

The love of nature came to Stevenson earlier than to most. At twenty-five he writes to Mrs. Sitwell:

It is just now the top of spring. The whole country is mad with green. To see the cherry-blossom bitten out upon the black firs, and the black firs bitten out of the blue sky, was a sight to set before a king.

He was always encompassed by the great problem how to describe what he saw and felt. At twenty-three he wrote to the same correspondent from "up among the olive yards" at Mentone:

I tried for long to hit upon some language that might catch ever so faintly the indefinable shifting colour of olive leaves; and, above all, the changes and little silverings that pass over them, like blushes over a face, when the wind tosses great branches to and fro.

To Mrs. Sitwell, at the age of twenty-five, he makes this intimate confession:

Oh, I have such a longing for children of my own; and yet I do not think I could bear it if I had one! I fancy I must feel more like a woman than like a man about that. I sometimes hate the children I see in the street—you know what I mean by hate—wish they were somewhere else, and not there to mock me; and sometimes, again, I don't know how to go by them for the love of them, especially the very wee ones.

Four years later, during one of his bouts of bad health, depression has temporarily seized him. He writes to Mr. Gosse thus:

I am going for thirty now; and unless I can snatch a little rest before long, I have, I may tell you in confidence, no hope of seeing thirty-one. . . . It is a pity in one sense, for I believe the class of work I might yet give out is better and more real and solid than people fancy. But death is no bad friend: a few aches and gasps, and we are done. Like the truant child, I am beginning to grow weary and timid in this big, jostling city, and could run to my nurse, even although she should have to whip me before putting me to bed.

This to his father at the age of thirty-three:

The great double danger of taking life too easily, and taking it too hard, how difficult it is to balance that. But we are all too little inclined to faith; we are all, in our serious moments, too much inclined to forget that all are sinners, and fall justly by their faults, and, therefore, that we have no more to do with that than the thunderstorm, only to trust and do our best, and wear as smiling a face as may be for others and ourselves.

From Royat, at thirty-four, this lament is sent to Mr. Colvin:

I am very dim, dumb, dowie, and damnable. . . . Do not think me unhappy: I have not been so for years; but I am blurred, inhabit the debatable frontier of sleep, and have but dim designs upon activity. All is at a standstill: books closed, paper put aside, the voice—the eternal voice of R. L. S.—well silenced.

In the same year he writes to Mr. Henley from Bournemouth:

This pleasant middle age into whose port we are steering is quite to my fancy. I would cast anchor here, and go ashore for twenty years, and see the manners of the place. Youth was a great time, but somewhat fussy.

Five years later he is at Honolulu. The clouds have cleared. To Mr. James Payn he writes:

I have nothing but happiness to tell. . . . This climate; these voyagings; these landfalls at dawn; new islands peaking from the morning bank; new forested harbours; new passing alarms of squalls and surf; new interests of gentle natives—the whole tale of my life is better to me than any poem.

He was happy at sea, was happy in his sea-girt home at Samoa. In that beautiful climate, his health restored, he recovered his old attitude of joy and wonder in the world. At forty-four, to his cousin, Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson, he writes:

As I go on in life, day by day, I become more of a bewildered child; I cannot get used to this world, to procreation, to heredity, to sight, to hearing; the commonest things are a burthen. The prim, obliterated, polite face of life, and the broad, bawdy, and orgiastic—or mœnadic —foundations, form a spectacle to which no habit reconciles me; and "I could wish my days to be bound each to each" by the same open-mouthed wonder.

In the last year of his life, in a letter to Mr. Baxter, he says: "Literally no man has more wholly outlived life than I. And still it's good fun." Outlived life! He was on the threshold of a period of mellow fruitfulness to which the past years had been but a preparation—the period of Weir of Hermiston.

It is impossible, within the limits of a single article, even to suggest Stevenson's range and variety as a letter writer. His criticism of books would alone make a subject for an article. Like most creative minds, where he admiied he admired enthusiastically. Writing to Mr. Henley he speaks thus of Mr. Meredith's Egoist:

When I shall have read it the sixth or seventh, I begin to see I shall know about it. You will be astonished when you come to re-read it; I had no idea of the matter—human, red matter he has contrived to plug and pack into that strange and admirable book.

To Mr. W. B. Yeats he writes:

It may interest you to hear that I have a third time fallen in slavery [he has already particularised the two former occasions—Swinburne's Poems and Ballads, and Meredith's Love In a Valley]; this is to your poem called The Lake Isle of Innisfree. It is so quaint and airy, simple, artful, and eloquent to the heart—but I seek words in vain. Enough, that "always night and day I hear lake water lapping with low sounds on the shore."

Mr. Henry James's work aroused his enthusiasm with reservations. We reproduce a portion of a facsimile letter to the author of Roderick Hudson:

We are all sleeping pretty fit and pretty hearty; but this letter is not from me to you, it is from a reader of R. H. to the author of the same, and it says nothing, and has nothing to say, but Thank you.

We are going to re-read Casanova as a paper pendant. Sir, I think there two are your heart, and can not who knows it

At the end Stevenson drops into this criticism:

May I beg you, the next time Roderick is printed off, to go over the sheets of the last few chapters, and strike out "immense" and "tremendous"? You have simply dropped them there like your pocket-handkerchief; all you have to do is to pick them up and pouch them, and your room—what do I say?—your cathedral, will be swept and garnished.

This is not the occasion to attempt an inquiry into Stevenson's status as novelist, essayist, and poet. As a human document he himself was a more interesting and various study than his books. Probably the personality of no writer has ever so captured the sympathy, the interest, and the love of his contemporaries. In the history of our literature we have had brilliant and versatile minds—minds that ran when others walked—touched to such issues of fancy, folly, and fun, that they had the power to thrill their hearers or readers as they listed. We have also had grave and serious minds, ever conscious of the profound intention that underlies material things, while refusing to be harnessed to any creed of man's making. In Stevenson was welded these two natures. Therein lies his strength and influence. He did, to the utmost of his ability, the work to which he felt he had been called, and he never lost sight of the Eternal Verities. His view of them was not orthodox. It was his own, purchased at his own cost. In a letter to Mr. Gosse, written at the age of thirty-six, he states his simple faith, and the limitations of his hopes:

If I could believe in the immortality business, the world would indeed be too good to be true; but we were put here to do what service we can, for honour and not for hire: the sods cover us, and the worm that never dies, the conscience, sleeps well at last; these are the wages, besides what we receive so lavishly day by day; and they are enough for a man who knows his own frailty and sees all things in the proportion of reality. The soul of piety was killed long ago by that idea of reward. Nor is happiness, whether eternal or temporal, the reward that man seeks. Happinesses are but his wayside campings; his soul is in the journey; he was born for the struggle, and only tastes his life in effort and on the condition that he is opposed. How, then, is such a creature, so fiery, so pugnacious, so made up of discontent and aspiration, and such noble and easy passions—how can he be rewarded but by rest? . . . The truth is, we must fight until we die; and when we die there can be no quiet for mankind but complete resumption into—what?—God, let us say—when all these desperate tricks will be spellbound at last.

There spoke the real Stevenson, the man apart from the artist, the Stevenson that we see lurking and brooding within the brilliant and versatile figure that flits and leaps, smiling, shouting, moaning, laughing through these volumes. If it be objected that the passage we have quoted is but the reflection of a mood, sincere to the feeling of the moment, but temporary, fugitive, read the prayer he composed and read aloud to his family the evening before his death:

We beseech Thee, Lord, to behold us with favour, folk of many families and nations, gathered together in the peace of this roof; weak men and women, subsisting under the covert of Thy patience.

Be patient still; suffer us yet a little longer—with our broken purposes of good, and our idle endeavours against evil—suffer us a little longer to endure, and (if it may be) help us to do better. Bless to us our extraordinary mercies; if the day come when these must be taken, have us play the man under affliction. Be with our friends; be with ourselves. Go with each of us to rest; if any awake, temper to them the dark hours of watching; and when the day returns to us, our sun and comforter, call us up with morning faces and with morning hearts—eager to labour, eager to be happy, if happiness shall be our portion—and if the day be marked for sorrow, strong to endure it.

We thank Thee and praise Thee; and in the words of Him to whom this day is sacred, close our oblation.

The End of a Monumental Work.

"ITALY AND HER INVADERS."—Vols. VII. and VIII.: The Frankish Invasions. By Thomas Hodgkin, D.C.L. (Clarendon Press.)

THESE volumes close the lucid and learned work which, with Gibbon and Prof. Bury's Later Roman Empire, forms the necessary introduction for every student to the history of modern Europe. Dr. Hodgkin may look back with just pride upon the monumental result of his twenty-five years' labour. To characterise so familiar a book would be, at this period, superfluous. Among Dr. Hodgkin's many brilliant chapters, we may single out for especial comment that which deals with the most remarkable and far-reaching in its effects of all historical forgeries, the Donation of Constantine. Dr. Hodgkin sketches the historical relations between the real Constantine and the real Pope Sylvester; then the "farrago of nonsensical romance" which, in the eighth century, passed as a genuine account of the baptism of the first Christian emperor. Actually, Constantine was baptized by an Arian bishop of Nicæa on his death-bed. According to the Vita Sylvestri the baptism was due to a dream in which St. Peter and St. Paul appeared to the Emperor and recommended to him the rite as an invaluable specific for the leprosy from which he suffered. The miracle worked, Constantine issued edicts in favour of Christianity, and began to build St. Peter's.
